If, then, we wish to avoid an indefinite suspension of specie payments with all its attendant evils, we cannot do it by substituting one national paper obligation payable on demand for another; we cannot national paper obligation payable on demand for another; we cannot do it by an artificial and enforced contraction of the gold supplies; we cannot do it by substituting legal-tenders for national-bank notes; we can only do it by absorbing and retiring a portion of the legal-tenders, thus appreciating the value of the remainder, and by such legislation as will make us a creditor instead of a debtor nation. By such absorption and legislation gold will flow in upon us in small rills from every country, until the accumulated mass before the day of resumption will be so large that banks and Treasury will be enabled to pay their notes, to all who may demand it, in the honest currency recognized as such by all the world, and a safe and sound business conducted on legitimate principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the principles will restore us again to a persence of the same and the sa ness conducted on legitimate principles will restore us again to a permanent national prosperity.

APPENDIX.

But when a nation is year after year drawn upon for coin to pay balances standing against it in the foreign marts whither its produce is sent, whence its fabrics and wares are imported; when its banks, because of such drafts find it difficult and sometimes impossible to maintain specie payments; when the obligations of its government, States, provinces, counties, or cities, and of its industrial or moneyed corporations are constantly tending abroad for sale even atruinous rates, with no countercurrent of securities in the opposite direction; when such a country finds its leaks founded in part on foreign capital, its mines sold out to foreign creditors, its railroads in good measure owned and managed if not actually constructed by them, and everything tending more and more to make its people toil and sweat through future ages to pay barely the interest and dividends which must necessarily be due from them to foreigners, then I submit that the course on which that country has entered is perilous, and portends evil at hand.

I do not insist that a nation should prize gold and silver above wealth, seeking to import and amass them; I do not say that a moderate afflux of the precious metals from a country which bounteously produces them is to be deprecated; I do not say that a nation should never owe a stiver abroad, nor import a fraction more than its exports in a given year; but I do hold that a nation, like an individual or a family, should pay as it goes; should buy no more than it can pay for; should dread running into debt, and avoid it when it may; and that the exportation of its coin or bullion beyond the amount of its annual product is improvident, thriftless, and tempts as well as tends to financial disaster. "In time of peace and fair harvests we need not run in debt, and should not."—Greely's Political Economy, page 67.

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire what, if any, sum may be due to Charles B. Varney, of Portland, Maine, for rent and use of lends in Portland for the years 1867 and 1868 and a part of 1869, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to; and the accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of a very large number of leading merchants of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law. They further state that as merchants doing business over a widely extended section of country they would greatly prefer to look to the State courts for protection of their interests rather than to the complex, dilatory, and expensive bankrupt law, which in practice has benefited only the officials by whom it is administered, and those bankrupts who do not hesitate to swear falsely, while it has frequently been used to oppress the honest debtor. Former bankrupt laws have been short-lived, and they believe that the present one should be repealed at the earliest practicable moment. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD. I present the petition of Niel Nielson, of the city of Philadelphia, asking for a pension. I desire to state that this man was injured while in the service of the United States on board a revenue-cutter. He fired a salute under order of his superior officer, and his right arm was shattered. He is a disabled seaman, and was honorably discharged. His own petition is accompanied by the petition of a number of the most intelligent and responsible citizens of Philadelphia, by whom he is known, as well as a recommendation from the district judge of the United States court for that district. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Dacosta, New Jersey, praying Congress for the repeal of the specie-resumption act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN presented a petition of business men of Cleveland, Ohio, praying Congress to repeal the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURMAN. I have received by mail and present nine petitions from citizens of the State of Ohio, in which the petitioners say they believe that Congress should, under proper guarantees, extend the national credit to the completion of a great southern line to the Pacific—I suppose a line of railroad is meant—and that the guaran-Pacific—I suppose a line of rairroad is meant—and that the guarantee of interest upon the bonds of the company, protected by a first mortgage and a lien upon all the revenues of the road, be so secured that no liability can result from the same. They therefore pray Congress to extend this aid, and thus be the means of largely furnishing the employment and relief absolutely necessary to the laboring men of the country. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Railroads—I believe we have such a committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of C. W. Ingalls and 65 others, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a light-house at Little Traverse, Michigan; which was referred

A bill (H. R. No. 683) to authorize the sale of cadet rifles;

A bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut:

A bill (H. R. No. 1343) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut;
A bill (H. R. No. 1384) to change the name of the schooner Turner & Keller, of Oswego, to that of Falmouth;
A bill (H. R. No. 1668) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the deficiency bill approved March 3, 1875; and
A joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) in favor of John M. English, of North Carolina.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Hon.

SAMUEL S. Cox, a Representative from the State of New York, Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution declaring the 22d of February in this year a native of the Speaker. tional holiday; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

BIRTHDAY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HAMLIN. The concurrent resolution which has just been received from the House should be acted upon this morning, if it is to be acted upon at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to let it go over until after the morning business is concluded.

Mr. HAMLIN. We should consider it now. I ask that it be taken up at this time.
Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Be it resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That for the promotion of national feeling throughout the Union on the occasion of the centennial year of our Independence, and believing this to be the proper time for the expression of our appreciation of the great services rendered to the people and the cause of liberty by the Father of our Country, George Washington, the 22d day of the present month shall be treated and deemed a national holiday throughout the United States in the Government business, and, so far as is consistent with the public welfare, in all of the departments of the Government employment shall be suspended for that day.

consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. I rise not to object to this resolution or to delay its adoption, but to predict that the time will come, if it has not now come, when reasons not unlike those on which this resolution rests will move Congress to make a holiday of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. I will not propose it now, because I see the force of the suggestion that time is scant within which to act favorably upon the pending proposal. I content myself with improving the occasion to record my belief that the time is not distant when the American peo-ple in Congress assembled will set apart and commemorate the other day as fit to be treasured with ascriptions and attributes not unlike those which deserve the action the Senate is about to take.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

No. 464) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 290) to amend section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it back adversely. We have passed a bill already which makes the same provision that this bill does. I move that it be indefinitely postponed. The motion was agreed to.

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1054) to extend the time for claimants, under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, to prove their claims, to report the same favorably with certain verbal amendments, and to ask its present consideration. I will say that I ask its present consideration contrary to my usual practice, because the bill merely extends the time for a few claimants, seamen and others, who were not within reach it was said at the time; and in order to avoid the necessity of extending the duration of the court any longer, it was thought desirable, if it should meet the view of the Senate, to pass this as soon as possible.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It makes it the duty of the court of commissioners for the Alabama claims to receive, examine, and pass commissioners for the Alabama claims to receive, examine, and pass upon all claims that may be admissible under the provisions of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress which may be presented and filed within three months hereafter, if it shall appear by the claimants' petition that, by reason of the absence of the claimants from the United States, or their ignorance of the time limited for the from the United States, or their ignorance of the time limited for the filling of petitions, or for other reasons satisfactory to the court, such claims have not been previously presented to the court within the time limited; and such claims, in cases where the claimants shall be absent from the United States at the time of presenting the petition, may be presented and verified by the attorney in fact of such claimants; and their evidence in support of their respective claims may be taken, if abroad, before any officer authorized to administer an oath by the authorities of the country where they reside, to be authenticated in due form of law.

The amendments of the committee were to make the proviso read as follows:

As follows:

Provided, That it shall appear by the claimant's petition and be proved to the satisfaction of the court that by reason of his absence from the United States, or his ignorance of the time limited for the filing of a petition by such claimant, or by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake the claim of such claimant has not been previously presented to said court within the time limited by said act; and such claim, in cases where the claimant shall be absent from the United States at the time of presenting the petition, may be presented and verified in such manner as the court shall by rule have provided.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and that the bill be read a third time. The bill was read

WABASH AND ERIE CANAL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of James A. Briggs, attorney, &c., praying the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of that portion of the Wabash and Eric Canal in the State of Indiana lying between Terre Haute, Indiana, and the Ohio State line, have instructed me to report a resolution, and I ask for its present consideration. The facts, as I understand them to be, are simply these: This canal was constructed, a grant having been made of land by the United States, with the provision that it should be kept open as a highway for the use of the United States. By some proceedings of the receiver the canal is advertised to be sold on the 24th of this month. The resolution asks information from the Attorney-General whether the rights of the United States need to be protected, and that in the mean time he may take necessary measures to have the sale postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks the present consideration of the resolution which he reports. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to Congress whether any act is necessary to protect the property or interest of the United States in the Wabash and Eric Canal from Terre Haute, Indiana, to the State of Ohio, and that he be requested in the mean time to take such measures as he may deem necessary to have the sale of the said canal, which is advertised for the 24th instant, postponed.

onsideration of the resolution?

Mr. BOOTH. I notice that neither of the Senators from Indiana is in his seat. I suppose they will be in during the morning hour, and it might be well to defer the resolution until that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over for the present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say to the Senator from California that I have no objection to waiting for a little while for the Senators from Indiana to come in; but, if this resolution is to be of any service, inasmuch as the sale is on the 24th and to-morrow is dies non, it must be passed this morning.

LIGHT-HOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. SARGENT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 373) to promote the efficiency of the lighthouse service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 465) to fix the retired pay of Surgeon-General Clement A. Finley; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 466) to locate and establish an assay office at Portland, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in connection with the introduction of this bill I desire to make a remark or two for the ear of the committee to whom the bill has been referred. Ever since I have had a seat in this body there has been a constant and, as I think, reasona seat in this body there has been a constant and, as I think, reasonable demand made upon me by the people of the North Pacific coast, by whom I mean the people of Oregon, Northern Idaho, Washington Territory, and Alaska, for some Government regulation by which the large amount of gold-dust produced annually in that section of counrange amount of gold-dast produced amounty in that section of contry might be reduced to bars without shipment and by which a fixed value might be placed upon these bars. This demand has induced me to make an attempt in Congress to secure the passage of a law establishing an assay office at Portland, Oregon.

It is estimated by those who are in a position to be well informed It is estimated by those who are in a position to be well informed on the subject that not less than from four to five million dollars' worth of gold-dust come to and pass through Portland, Oregon, annually, and, although every facility for assaying by a private assay office is given, a little less than $400,000 are annually assayed there, and why for the simple reason that gold bars have no fixed value. Bankers and brokers in Portland seldom pay for gold bars within 2 per cent. of their value in San Francisco, although the cost of shipment between the two places is only about \( \frac{1}{2} \) of \( \frac{2}{3} \) of 1 per cent. by Wells, Fargo & Company's express.

The establishment of an assay office in Portland would obviate all this, by the agent of the Government in charge of the office issuing to the owner of the gold assayed a certificate upon any sub-treasury of the United States for the full Government value of the gold bar, less the charges for transportation to the United States Mint, which would leave a balance in favor of the producer—the man who digs in the mines and who owns the bar—of nearly 2 per cent. But another and a greater evil, and one that affects adversely the prosperity of our whole country in draining it of its gold, would be remedied by the establishment of this office, and that is this: It is estimated that over $1,000,000 worth of gold-dust passes through Portland annually in the hands of Chinamen and is taken directly out of the country to China. The Chinese can realize more money from their dust in China than they can here.

Valuable gold mines have been recently discovered in Alaska. All of Northern Idaho, part of Montana, Washington Territory, and most of Eastern Oregon draw their supplies from Portland. The mines of Elk City, Florence, Warren's, Salmon River, Snake River, Slate Creek, Miller's Camp, Oro Fino, Pierce City, Newsom Creek, Clear Water, Santain, Umatilla, and many other camps, as also the mines in Southern and Western Oregon, are now being worked to good advantage, and unquestionably will be by thousands of men, for many years to come, with fair profit. In these various camps there are engaged not less than fifteen thousand Chinese who work their own placerclaims, either taking up abandoned ground or purchasing claims too low in yield to be worked profitably by white labor. Ground thus taken turns out to be very valuable. It is this class of mines that export from the United States over $1,000,000 annually from this section, a great portion of which could be kept in the country if they could obtain something near its value, and many would prefer to purchase drafts from our bankers on Hong-Kong and Canton, which exchange is needed to pay for the many cargoes of lumber and flour which we export by ships sailing direct from the ports of Portland and Puget Sound.

Heretofore when attempts have been made to secure the establishment of an assay office for the benefit of this region of country it has unfortunately been the case that some agent of the Treasury Department from the East, knowing nothing whatever about the country or the subject, has been sent out on a pleasure trip virtually, and after remaining a few weeks, during which time it would have been a mat-ter of impossibility to have obtained any correct information upon the subject, he has submitted his report, which at best could throw but little certain light on the subject.

In this connection I desire to state that Dr. Linderman, upon his attention being called to this subject in January, 1874, addressed me a communication in which he uses this language:

I have the honor to state that the present production of bullion from the mines of the North Pacific coast appears to be sufficient to justify the Government in providing assay facilities at the most convenient point for the accommodation of the same. The city of Portland being the commercial center of that section of the country, and the custom-house in that city affording the necessary room for assay operations, is the place where the proposed office should be located.

This letter bears date January 5, 1874. From this it will be seen that the establishment of an assay office at this place will not involve an expenditure for the purchase or construction of a building, as there is ample room in the new Government building in that city now just completed. I hope, therefore, that this subject will receive the serious consideration of the Committee on Finance, to which committee I move that the bill be referred.

The motion was agreed to.
Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 467) relating to pre-emption claims; which was read twice by its title, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 468) to amend section 3513, title 37, and section 3586, title 39, Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, relating to the silver coinage of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 463) for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph L. Locke, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of John S. Wood, late a first lieutenant in the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file in the case, re-ferred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 471) to re-open the lands of the Fort Sedgwick military reservation to settlement and occupation as public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 473) to provide for the erection of lighthouses in Albemarle Sound, North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to Mr. CLATION asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 474) to establish a post-route in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 475) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of the Glenwood cemetery," approved July 27, 1854; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition signed by 156 citizens of Washington on the subject of this bill. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia with the bill,

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 476) to amend the fifth section of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government approved May 18, 1872, and to extend the time for the presentation of claims for cotton seized after the 30th day of June, 1865; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 477) to re-imburse the loyal owners of the steamer Planter for the sale of that vessel by the Government; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LIBRARY FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of making an appropriation of $1,000 annually for the library of the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, I believe that for all the other Executive Departments an annual appropriation is made for the library of each; but, while there are a larger number of clerks, both male and female, in the Treasury than in any other Department, there is no such appropriation made, and there is a great demand for books, exceeding the supply that they have weekly. I therefore commend this subject to the Committee on the Library.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRE-EMPTION LAWS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is upon the Calendar in the order of business No. 44 a bill (S. No. 423) to repeal the pre-emption laws and to provide for the sale of timber upon the public lands of the United States that ought not to have gone on the Calendar. It does not need consideration at all. It was proposed by me and laid on the table and afterward offered as an amendment to another bill. It ought to be atruck off the calendar. be struck off the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. HARVEY. I desire to call up the resolution submitted by me on the 14th instant calling on the Secretary of War for information relative to the execution of the eight-hour law of 1868.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to present to the Senate such suggestions as may be deemed expedient for the public service, covering the period between May 19, 1869, and October 1, 1872, to enable the Government to carry out the provisions of an act constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, approved June 25, 1868.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to know the object of the resolution.

There must be some purpose.

Mr. HARVEY. The object of the resolution is to get before the Senate such information in an official manner as will enable us to see why that law has not been executed in some instances and to give us an opportunity to provide that it shall be executed.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the resolution, it only covers a period from 1869 to 1872.

Mr. HARVEY. During the other portion of the time the law was executed, and there is no question about that executed; and there is no question about that.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to know what remedy is proposed.

I do not see very well what can be done in case it has not been exe-

Mr. HARVEY. I hope when we get this information we can see what is necessary. I hope Senators will not object to this resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I fear it may be laying the foundation for some appropriation. That is all I fear about it.

Mr. HARVEY. Without a knowledge of the facts, we cannot go into a discussion of the merits of the proposition. If any Senator wishes to discuss them, it can be done after the facts are laid before us.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the mover of the resolution if it is supposed that the Secretary of War in answer to this resolution will send a list of names of persons who are presumed by him to have demands against the Government of the United States for the non-enforcement of the law or for wages that may be due to them for doing ten hours' work instead of eight? I ask if that is the idea of the resolution?

Mr. HARVEY. That information as to the names of claimants can be obtained better from the chief of the Department in which the claims arise. I have no information about any of them. The idea of the resolution is to secure information necessary to the execution of the law.

Mr. SARGENT. My only objection to calling for information of that kind would be that it opens a fine field for claim agents; it ad-vertises them exactly where men are to be found who perhaps could be persuaded to make claims against the Government, and for a per-centage on their part to induce such claims, that it really would be of very little benefit to the individuals, but possibly might be of considerable benefit to claim agents. If that is the kind of information desired by the resolution, I certainly object to it.

Mr. HARVEY. I will state that according to my information these claims are of such a character that, if provided for, claim agents can have nothing to do with them. The payments to the men entitled would be made by officers of the Government directly to the parties, thus giving no opportunity to claim agents to have anything to do with the matter at all.

Mr. SARGENT. That does not cover the point, because claim agents do have contingent interests in a great many appropriations that the Government pays directly to the parties, as the Senator well knows in reference to Indian affairs.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator from California will allow me, I will suggest to him that when we have this information—and this resolution contemplates no more—it will become evident whether the matter is of such character that claim agents can have anything to do with it. I am satisfied, and the Senator from California and every other Senator here can satisfy himself, that in case any appropriations are made to meet such claims they will be made in such a way that claim agents can have nothing to do with them.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he refer this resolution to the Committee on Appropriations or some other committee, that it may be examined.

Mr. HARVEY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that when the information for which this resolution calls is brought before us it can be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and it can be considered there then. That, it seems to me, would be the proper course. I think it is unprecedented that a simple resolution for information should be met with such objections.

Mr. ALLISON. We can examine in committee the scope of the resolution and see what it covers.

Mr. SARGENT. This is not a resolution asking for information.

Certainly, if it is, it is very vague. It resolves

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to present to the Senate such suggestions as may be deemed expedient for the public service covering the period between May 19, 1869, and October 1, 1872, to enable the Government to carry out the provisions of an act, &c.

Whether these suggestions are to carry out the provisions of the act or not is not distinctly suggested, to use the words of the resolution. The resolution is certainly inartificially drawn. Whether we wish instruction from the Secretary as to what kind of a law we shall en-instruction from the Secretary as to what kind of a law we shall enact, or whether we want information from him whether the law has been violated or not, is certainly indefinite under the resolution. It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is proper that the resolution itself be referred to a committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In my opinion we do not need any suggestions from the Secretary of War on the subject. I have no hesitancy in saying that I believe the law was an evil as originally passed, and it has cost the Government of this country a great deal of money in reducing the hours of labor from ten to eight. If, however, the Secretary of War did not enforce the law and any of the employee of the tary of War did not enforce the law, and any of the employés of the Government labored ten hours a day, they chose voluntarily to do it. The time has passed now by six years, and I do not think we need any suggestions; and, as far as I am concerned, I do not want any suggestions from the Secretary of War on this subject, because if the proposition were here to pay those gentlemen for the extra work I should vote directly against it without any instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of War, or anybody else. This resolution is the initiatory step to present before the Senate the claims of a large number of persons to further tax the Treasury of the United States. I am opposed to it. The time has come when there ought to be some restriction upon the claims that are continually pressed upon the Treasury. For one, therefore, I should vote against the proposi-tion, if it were here now, to pay for that extra labor; and I want no suggestion, as far as I am concerned, and am ready to vote against the resolution.

Mr. HARVEY. In answer to the Senator from Delaware I will state that in this connection I do not propose to discuss the policy of state that in this connection I do not propose to discuss the policy of the eight-hour law, as that is a matter which is not involved within the scope of the resolution; but I think there is a question as to whether, having a law, we should see it enforced or not while it is in existence. This is the only object I have in this resolution, and I think it very singular indeed that in the consideration of a resolution asking for information concerning the execution or non-execution of a law, Senators should signify beforehand their intention not to discuss that question, but the question of the policy of the passage of the law in the first instance. As to that I propose to have nothing to say, because I should like to see this resolution pass, that such information should be brought before the Senate in a proper and official form that when we act more the question as to why the law was not form, that when we act upon the question as to why the law was not executed, we should do so knowingly.

Mr. KELLY. I call for the regular order—the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired; and the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SARGENT to insert after the words "United States," in line 19 of section 2, the words "or any right in said land or the timber thereon;" so as to read:

And that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States, or any right in said land or the timber thereon, should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have an amendment to offer to the bill, which I trust will meet the approval of the Senator from Oregon who has the bill in charge. In the third section, eighteenth line, after the word "coal," I move to insert:

And of the truth of the matters contained in the statement required to be made by the second section of this act.

As it stands now, it is required that the applicant for any of these lands shall establish certain things in corroboration of his statement, but it is not required that he shall corroborate all the matters contained in the statement. I propose that the proper officers shall be satisfied by evidence introduced of the truth of the matters that are contained in the statement when he makes application for the land contained in the statement when he makes application for the land. I am satisfied that there can be no objection on the part of the Senator from Oregon to this.

Mr. SARGENT. I see the Senator's idea and I perceive no objection to it. I ask him, however, how a party can prove a negative. Some of the matters are required to be asserted in the negative in his original affidavit; for instance, that he has not made a conveyance, that he has not given anybody a contingent interest. I suppose that could only be proven by him subsequently by his own affidavit taken over again.

Mr. WRIGHT. That might be, or it might be that the records sufficiently established that fact. It very frequently occurs that, while we say a party cannot establish a negative, the record may be in such a condition as to establish it. I think it ought not to rest alone upon the statement of the party, but there ought to be some corroboration. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Probably the certificate of the register of the county would be sufficient.
Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to my friend from Oregon whether the word "held," in line 28 of section 3, should not be "claimed:"

Provided, That any person having a valid claim to any portion of the land may object, in writing, to the issuance of a patent to lands so held by him.

Mr. KELLY. I think the word "claimed" would be a better word than "held."

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to strike out the word "held" and insert "claimed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not rise to propose an amendment now; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon, and the Senator from California also, to a possible difficulty, arising perhaps by implication, in the construction of this statute or in carrying it out, resulting from the use of the language found in lines 9 and 10 of

And after the expiration of said sixty days, if no adverse claim shall have been filed, the person desiring to purchase shall furnish, &c.

Suppose an adverse claim shall be filed, then what is to be done? Mr. KELLY. Then it is provided in line 26-

That any person having a valid claim to any portion of the land may object, in writing, to the issuance of a patent to lands so claimed by him, stating the nature of his claim thereto; and evidence shall be taken and the merits of said objection shall be determined by the officers of the land office, subject to appeal, as in other

Mr. WRIGHT. It is perhaps true that the amendment I before suggested, striking out "held" and inserting "claimed," obviates what would otherwise be an obscurity. As it stood, it would look as if the patent had already been issued, and that where there was an objection made on an adverse claim it must be made after the patent was issued and was held; but as it is now, it is made, as I understand, before the patent is issued, or during the time the claim is being made. That perhaps obviates the objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of the first section:

That the public lands affected by this act shall be offered at public sale as soon as practicable from time to time, and according to the provisions of existing laws, and shall not be subject to private entry until they are so offered.

Mr. KELLY. I think that amendment should not be adopted for the reason that, as has been stated repeatedly here, the policy of the Government has been not to offer any lands on the Pacific coast. Why it is so I do not know; but it is notorious that for the last fifteen years the lands there have been subject only to pre-emption and homestead claimants. The reason given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office is, as I have already stated, that combinations are formed to prevent the lands being sold for a greater amount than a dollar and a quarter angree; and a further reason is that the cost a dollar and a quarter an acre; and a further reason is that the cost of advertising far outweighs any good to result from it.

There is another reason. It will be difficult to advertise the timber lands unless it is known what portions of a township are timber lands. It will be necessary to have some person appointed to investigate and ascertain what are public lands unfit for cultivation and what are not. Taking into consideration the expenses of ascertaining that fact, and the expenses of advertising, and the probability that by a combination of purchasers nothing more than the minimum price would be realized, it seems to me that it would not be worth while to advertise the lands at public sale.

Again, these lands are proposed to be sold under this bill at two dollars and a half an acre, whereas, on this side of the Rocky Mountains, the minimum price is a dollar and a quarter. When we offer to give double the usual amount for the timber lands, I think it is unnecessary to go to the expense of advertising when no good will result from it.

Mr. CLAYTON. The reason, as I understand, why the public lands of the United States have not been offered at public sale for the past of the United States have not been offered at public sale for the past ten or fifteen years is simply because the policy of the Government has been to reserve all these lands for homestead entry. But now you propose to dispose of a certain portion of the public lands independ-ent of that process, upon the ground that they are unfit for agricul-ture. The lands that the Senator from Oregon refers to, as I under-stand, have never been offered at public sale at all. I cannot see the propriety of offering lands at public sale (as was required by the Sen-ate a few days ago) which have before been offered for public sale, again submitting them to that test, if you now allow these lands to again submitting them to that test, if you now allow these lands to be subject to private entry without being offered at public sale at all. It seems to me that the principle which required the lands in the five southern land States to be again offered at public sale would require these lands to be offered at public sale. I cannot see a reason why we should depart in this particular case from the rule which was laid down in that case by the Senate only a few days since.

Mr. KELLY. I would inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whèther the lands in those five States cannot now be sold for less than a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

Mr. KELLY. Can they not be entered for less?

Mr. CLAYTON. No. They cannot now be entered for that. must first be offered at public sale if the bill passes the other House that passed the Senate last week.

Mr. KELLY. Suppose the amendment had not been adopted the other day, what could they have been purchased for?

Mr. CLAYTON. They could then have been purchased at a dollar and a quarter at private entry, because they had been before offered. The rule is that, where lands have once been offered at public sale, they then can be entered at private entry.

Mr. KELLY. I am aware of that.
Mr. SARGENT. In any quantity?
Mr. CLAYTON. I think there is some limitation on that. My recollection is that there can only be a certain amount entered in each ollection is that there can only be a certain amount entered in each township by one person.

Mr. SARGENT. He can buy in as many townships as he wants.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; but in each particular township he can only buy a certain amount. Now I think myself that the two dollars and a half an acre clause in this bill is not necessary. I would be in favor of oftering these lands to the highest bidder, let them bring two dollars and a half, or ten dollars, or whatever the people think they are worth; and after that process is gone through with, let them be entered at private entry. I do not believe in making distinctions in favor of or against these particular States of the Pacific coast. I do not see any reason why the lands there should not come under the same rules which are applied to other public lands of the United States. More any reason why the lands there should not come under the same rules which are applied to other public lands of the United States. More especially I cannot see, as I before said, why these lands should be subject to private entry without going through the process which has always been applied to all other public lands of first exposing them to public sale. I think the idea which was advanced the other day, that combinations are likely to defeat such sales, is a mistake. As I before said, such combinations take place where men have settled upon lands for the purpose of making homes, where they have made their settlements before the sale; and in order to prevent some person from coming in and taking their homes away men have compression from coming in and taking their homes away men have comperson from coming in and taking their homes away men have combined. But these lands are not of that character; they are lands unfit for settlement, and they are lying in vast bodies all over the country. Men cannot make combinations in such a case. Squatters country. Men cannot make combinations in such a case. Squatters will not make combinations, because they have not squatted on the land; and I take it for granted you will have as fair a sale of them as of any other public property that is ever offered for sale. I think these lands ought to go through the same process.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Arkansas has a policy which he likes for the disposal of the public lands in his State. He was perfectly willing that the timber lands offered there should be bought in any quantity by individuals, and on a failure to sell that then subsequent individuals might come in, and at a dollar and a quarter an acre take whole counties, provided they were open to such taking. Now, we propose an entirely different policy with reference to my State, and for good and substantial reasons. We do not desire that monopolies shall seize hold of these treasures of timber in our State. We object to the general policy of the law which throws open at public auction an opportunity to buy whole counties in our State, ranges of mountains, to obtain vast territorial possessions. We object to it most strennously. I speak for myself, and I believe I speak for other Pacific-coast Senators, when I say that we would rather the Government, even under the present system, should retain these lands in its own hands than that monopolies should seize them from the Alaska line down to Lower California. We have drank bitterly of the evils produced by monopoly in our State. It has been a reproach to California, certainly justified in some respects, that it had been at the mercy of monopolies. I confess with sorrow that is true, but I do not feel that I am responsible for it heretofore or now, for so far as my voice has gone in Congress I have endeavored to break up the land system under which these monopolies were possible; under which township after township was taken and held by a few individuals. The circumstances are exceptional with California. Men in a few days, by a sudden turn of the wheel of fortune, become very rich by some lucky discovery of mines after years of disappointment, by some advance of stocks, by an appreciation of property, and have large means at their disposal. They go out and buy up, then, anything which promises a return, no matter how far the future may be when which promises a return, no matter how far the future may be when the return will come. So they buy whole broad valleys large enough for populous communities; and they have had their eyes on the timber lands of our State for years, and have sought legislation to enable them to procure them. We have constantly defeated the efforts in that direction, and now we come in with an exceptional bill to prevent just the operation of the general laws if they were applied to California; that is to say, by offering them to public sale in quantities that persons see fit to bid for, not giving less than a dollar and a quarter as a mere limit of price. The Government may advertise a million of acres in a single body, and they may be bought up by some of our wealthy men there, and then be locked up from settlement, locked up from the reasonable use of the present or the future, until speculative prices induce them to let go of the land. We wish to avoid that. That is the necessary effect of the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Arkansas, because it is entirely unlimited under the present law, and you apply this principle of offering lands there, and a person can buy in any quantity whatever.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the Senator from California, I desire to ask him to explain to the Senate in what manner the evils

I desire to ask him to explain to the Senate in what manner the evils of which he complains, and against which, I believe, he sincerely desires to guard, will be thwarted or prevented by the provisions of this

Mr. SARGENT. That is a very large subject and would require me to go over much that I said the other day. I do not wish to repeat it, but I will endeaver before concluding the very few remarks 1 wish to make, to remember the question of the Senator and answer it.

After this system of sale at public auction in unlimited quantities has exhausted itself, if any of the lands remain unsold and unseized by a few individuals who have the capital to seize them, then comes by a few individuals who have the capital to seize them, then comes on the system of what is called private entry, by which any person may take, up to a certain limit in each township, which I believe is something about from a third to half the township, and in as many townships as he sees fit. That is the system of private entry, and nearly as bad as the general system of offering lands. Both of them would entail evils, terrible evils on our coast. I would rather the timber should rot in the ground than that the land which it covers should be seized by these monopolists, that the amount of money which the Government should receive for it should rust in the Treasury. It would have no applied head to a while head to a second of the great disasters which would be of no public benefit on account of the great disasters which it would let loose on the people of the Pacific coast.

Now, this bill proposes that each individual may buy to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres, and exhaust his right—I say this in reply to the Senator from Kansas—after the purchase of the one hundred and sixty acres; and he is required, by such guards as we can provide, not to enter on the possessions of another; not to enter on any lands which are valuable for minerals; not to make any bargain by which any one else may receive any benefit from it, either the title or the timber upon the land; not to make any bargain by which any contingent interest whatever, in advance of the title, at any rate, can go to another individual.

Mr. INGALLS. But by a single clause in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth lines of section 2 you render all that provision entirely nugatory by declaring that-

Any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bond fide purchasers, shall be null and void.

Of course, if these corporations desire to resort to the purchased efforts of individuals in order to enable them to secure great portions of the public domain, they will take the precaution to obtain the title as soon as it has vested in the pre-emptor or purchaser, and this bill, by providing that when that title has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser it shall be good, virtually nullifies and renders absurd the whole law and does away with every safeguard.

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all. The Senator, I think, misconstrues it.

The provision is that after the discovery of the perjury of the individual (which we punish with the pains and penalties of perjury) his land is forfeited unless it is to go into the hands of a bona fide holder. Who is a bona fide holder? The person who is particeps criminis; the person who induced him to commit perjury in order to seize the lands? Is that the proper construction? Suppose, however, a person who knows nothing in reference to the matter at all becomes the purchaser after the title has vested; suppose that the person swore falsely and his bargain with the other individual fell through so that he would be light to the prime and condition of review and then appears after the state of the same and condition of review and then appears are supposed to the same and condition of the same and the same are supposed to the same and the same are supposed to the same a be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury and then some person, he having the title of record, comes along and buys it. The statute would not reach that. It says it shall not be forfeited in his hands. You cannot pass any law to restrain alienation after the Government shall have absolutely parted with the title; and if then two persons see fit to put their possessions together, neither the policy nor the letter of the law would prohibit it. It is simply to protect innocent purchasers, and not those who are participes criminis, and that is the class whom the Senator describes by his question.

I do not think that lines twenty-eight and twenty-nine of the second section are very important, and, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to their being stricken from the bill. It is the policy of the law that forfeitures should be strictly construed, and I suppose that laws leading up to forfeitures should be carefully considered and guarded as much as possible so as to prevent those who are innocent suffering from that, the highest kind of penalty.

For the reason that we do not wish to let loose on our coast on these broad timber lands the speculators who may have the means to buy them up and hoard them for the future we desire that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas shall not prevail. I can only say that if the amendment were put on the bill I should vote against it because I do not want this wild, reckless system fastened on my

Mr. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

In addition to what has been said by the Senator from California, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the report made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office last year and reiterated in his report this year, and we ought to be governed by the experience of that Office. He says in his report:

It is true that the law provides that in the discretion of the President this class-

Speaking of the timber lands of the country-may be proclaimed and sold at public outcry to the highest bidder, but the experience of this Office shows this method to be entirely ineffectual, for the reasons, first, that under the ordinary system of surveys the "field notes" cannot disclose, with any degree of accuracy, which are pine lands and which are not—

These lands, it will be remembered, have already been surveyed, but there is no designation of what are timber-lands, what are prairie lands, what lands are fit for agricultural purposes, and what are unfit. This fact would have to be ascertained now in order to know what character of lands should be offered for sale. Now allow me to read

and second, that there is little room for doubt that combinations are formed among purchasers at Government public sales, whereby prices are kept down to a merely nominal figure. The usual result is, therefore, the Government receives the minimum price of the lands, less the large expense of three months' advertising required by law. Another and greater evil results from such public sales under existing laws. This Office having, as I have before stated, no reliable means of distinguishing pine lands, it is reduced to the necessity of including in the proclamation all lands supposed to contain pine. It results that only such small proportion of the tracts proclaimed as are known to the purchasers to contain pine are sold, while the great mass of them, receiving no bid, remain with the Government as "offered lands," subject thenceforth to private cash purchase without settlement, and become the easy prey of non-resident speculators, thus defeating the now well established and beneficent policy of the Government in that regard.

That is the experience of the Land Depositment and the present.

That is the experience of the Land Department, and the proposal now by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is to throw all these evils upon the people of the Pacific coast. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, my principal object in calling for the yeas and nays was to get a little time to receive some information from the Land Office. I found myself at odds the other day with the Senator from California and the Senator from Ohio upon the question as to what was the practice of the Land Office and what it had been for years past in the matter of disposing of the public domain. Those Senators said that the Land Office had become utterly disgusted with the idea of offering lands at public sale, and for twenty years had abandoned that policy. I thought I was very confident that the Land Office had continued that policy up to the present time, or very near the present time.

Mr. SARGENT. Under general or special laws?

Mr. HOWE. Under both general and special laws. I was in the Interior Department on Saturday last and asked the Commissioner of the General Land Office how the fact was, and he told me that they had had repeated sales, and he told me when the last sale was in the State of Wisconsin, but I will not undertake to repeat what he said.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator observe that I stated the other day that there was certain exceptional legislation by which, first, a military reservation and then a portion of an Indian reservation, under special laws, were sold in the State of Wisconsin, and that such cases had occurred elsewhere? But I said that the policy of the general laws with reference to offering lands and subsequently opening them to private entry had been discontinued, using round figures, for twenty years-I mean from sixteen to twenty. If there is any authority to show that I am mistaken in reference to that matter, I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. HOWE. I can show it, unless the Commissioner of the Land Office misinformed me on Saturday last; show that the Senator is entirely mistaken.

I do not think that is an answer to my statement. Mr. HOWE. No, I have not the information here. I supposed it would be here before this time, but as I have not the information I cannot at this moment prove by the record that I was correct on the question of practice, and that the Senator from California was wrong. But on the question of expediency, that is to say, if human reason, if the understanding of men will furnish us any guide, I can prove right on the spot that there is no sort of difference between bringing into market lands which never have been in market and bringing into market another tract of land which has been reserved under a special law, or for a special purpose, for a given period of time. The reason is precisely the same in both cases.

When you propose to bring into market lands which have never been offered to the world, the supposition is that some of those lands are or may be worth more than the minimum price; and in order to determine whether they are or not, you offer them at public sale, at which every man is at liberty to bid against every other man, and the law says no tract shall be sold for less than the minimum price. That is why the law requires those lands to be sold at public sale.

Now, the same reasoning applies to lands which have once been offered and then withdrawn for any reason whatever from the market. There has been a time when the lands could not be purchased under a general law. Now you propose to bring them into market again and upon the supposition that in the interim when they have been out of market some of them may have advanced beyond the minimum price. In order to determine that question, all the special laws that I know anything about require that they should be offered again at public sale.

It was said on the floor that it was useless to offer them at public sale, because it led to combinations between purchasers. My answer to that is twofold: First, if combination would prevent the sale of a tract when it was offered for the first time and under your general laws, and would prevent the sale of it for a higher price than the minimum, it would prevent the sale of any other land at a higher price. I say it does not prevent the sale of lands which in my own State have been brought into market under special law and offered at public sale.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?
Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.
Mr. SARGENT. The case which the Senator refers to was I think something less than a township, a very small piece of land, near one populous town in a thriving community. In regard to a small piece of land, where there were no settlers upon it because it was a part of an Indian reservation, a combination was entirely impossible. There were abundant bidders there necessarily. A combination that interested one-tenth of the people would have been broken. In other words, combination was impossible because there were ample bids and only a small piece of property to be sold. That was the reason the sale succeeded. You cannot reason from a case of that kind to one where there are a million acres or five million acres and a small number of bidders.

Mr. HOWE. My poor unaided reason would lead me to the con-clusion that it was rather easier on the whole to effect a combination which might swallow up a small tract than to effect a combination which would swallow up millions.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me? Where there are millions it is easy enough to parcel out among the members of the combinations. Where there is a single tract there is not enough to satisfy all, and therefore they break combinations.

Mr. HOWE. Well, that reason did not occur to me, and it has some force in it. But, after all, if the small tract be divided into more tracts than there are purchasers, this explanation does not hold good. Now, as to the fact; the Senator thinks that the cases to which I referred embraced less than a township. One of the cases I spoke of the other day did include less than a township, less than seven thousand acres of land; but it adjoined a town site, and it was subdivided into forty-acre tracts, into twenty-acre tracts, into ten-acre tracts, into one-acre tracts, and a portion of it into village lots, so that there were in fact, a great many tracts to be sold. Another case to which I referred the other day was the case of the sale of a township and a half which had belonged to the Stockbridge Indians. There were two sales un-der special laws. But I have known repeated sales in the State of Wisconsin under general laws, and I never knew and never heard of a wisconsin under general laws, and I have a law of the combination in any one of them which influenced the sale, with one exception, and that was precisely a case like that referred to by the capatar from Arkansas where the lands had been settled upon. They had been granted for the construction of a canal in the southern part of the State and kept out of market a long time until the country all of the State and kept out of market a long time until the country all about was settled up. They were taken possession of by actual settlers, and homes made upon them. There was a combination there, and the community did, I believe, very generally stand back and say that they would not bid against the occupants of those tracts who were bidding for the purpose of securing their homes. I do not recollect the facts as to the moneys received from the sale, but I believe those lands went for just about the minimum price. But that took place twenty-five years ago, I think, and that is the only case of a combination in the State of Wisconsin I ever heard of.

Mr. WINDOM Will the Sengtar permit me to ask whether his at-

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator permit me to ask whether his attention was called to the sale at Eau Claire about the year 1874?
Mr. HOWE. No, sir. I should be glad to have the attention of the Senate called to it.
Mr. WINDOM. I respectfully refer him to that case.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me what that

Mr. WINDOM. The lands were advertised, and on the morning of the sale notice was given that parties who did not pay up on their bids could not be permitted to bid again. On that notice the lands were run up from six to eighteen and twenty dollars an acre. Parties who were present desiring to bid became discouraged and went home. The first day's bidding was entirely dropped. These high bids were never taken up or paid for, and the next day parties came in and bought the lands at two dollars and a half an acre. I do not know whether my friend calls that a combination or not, but that was the result of it.

Mr. HOWE. I return my profound thanks to my friend from Minnesota for contributing that piece of history to elucidate this debate. I take the history, and I tell him that it shows conclusively bate. I take the history, and I tell him that it shows conclusively that a combination is not practicable. There they wanted the lands; there were not millions sold; and they did not attempt a combination. They did attempt a trick which a very simple amendment to the law would have guarded against, the trick being to bid high on the lands while the purchasers were all there, forfeit their bids, and then when their competitors left the ground, there being no notice to them, come in and bid again at the minimum price.

Mr. WINDOM. I merely mention that to show that my friend's constituents are human are like to others, and that if thet opening.

constituents are human, are like to others, and that if that opening had not been presented for getting the lands at the minimum price they would have combined and got them in some other way, as they do everywhere else.

Mr. HOWE. I have not been bragging about my constituents; but I see no evidence yet that the men who played this fine trick were not from Minnesota; and if they had come from Minnesota I would not for a moment intimate that the people of Wisconsin would not be up to that sort of thing as readily as the people of any other State. I simply say that such combinations cannot be effected between the people of any State; and a simple amendment to that law requiring that if bids were forfeited the lands should not be re-offered again until they had been re-advertised again would have prevented that

Mr. WINDOM. That one would have been defeated.

Mr. HOWE. Why, sir, in 1856—you will be surprised to hear that I was doing business as early as that—I bought lands in the State of Wisconsin at $2 per acre which had been sold at Government public

Wisconsin at $2 per acre which had been sold at Government public sale as long ago as 1836 under your general laws as high as $7 per acre. Still I might as well give up this debate. I am not specially interested in the fate of this amendment. I believe it is right. My principal purpose, however, in speaking was not to show that it is right, but to get time which would enable me to show that, on a question of practice, I have not been mistaken. That time does not seem to have availed me, and I do not wish to talk out the often seem.

guestion of practice, I have not been mistaken. That time does not seem to have availed me, and I do not wish to talk out the afternoon for the sake of getting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON,] upon which the yeas and navs have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, and Wadleigh—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Hitchcock, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, and West—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in the light which the advocates of this bill throw upon it, it wears an aspect of duplicity and disingenuthis offit throw upon it, it wears an aspect of duplicity and disingenuousness which certainly is not favorable. The Senator from California [Mr. Sargent] says it is an act to enable the people of his State to be honest. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Oglesby] alleges that his purpose in sustaining it is to protect the timber from fire. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Kelly] alleges that its real intent and object is to enable the citizens of the States and Territories affected by it to obtain possession of the timber upon the lands for manufacture into obtain possession of the timber upon the lands for manufacture into lumber for the purposes of flumes and fences and the construction of their buildings and their cities. It therefore appears to be of very great doubt what the real object of it is. It is a good deal like the celebrated piece of furniture described by Goldsmith, which was—

Contriv'd a double debt to pay, A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day.

I have no doubt myself that the purpose of the bill is to throw the control of this very valuable and heavily timbered land into the hands of the railroad and mining corporations of the Pacific coast; but as it is evidently a foregone conclusion that the bill is to pass, I do not propose to discuss it further upon its merits, but simply to call the attention of the Senate to one very obnoxious feature of this bill, and that is its partiality. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from California upon what ground and for what reason they exclude from the privileges they demand for the citizens of their own

States and the Territory of Washington, the citizens of Montana, of Idaho, of Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, who have no representatives upon this floor, and who are equally interested with the citizens of the States named in the passage of some bill enabling them to obtain possession of timber?

Mr. SARGENT. Has not the Senator heard it stated three or four times that the amount was put less in those Territories at the request of the Delegates from the Territories, on account of the greater scarcity of timber there? That has been stated three or four times in the presence of the Senate, and, I presume, in the presence of the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. I have heard that statement repeatedly made, and if the Delegates from those Territories have urged that as a reason, I if the Delegates from those Territories have urged that as a reason, I can only say that they exhibit a most amazing and profound ignorance as to the material resources of the Territories which they misrepresent; for I allege, and I believe the testimony of every man who has traversed that portion of our country will sustain me in the allegation, that the material characteristics of the regions that I have named are identical with those of the portion of the country named in this bill. I, sir, have traversed a very large portion of that country myself on horseback. All those Territories are portions of that great system of the Cordilleras extending from Behring Strait on the porth to the inthus of Tehnantence on the south with a lateral exnorth to the isthmus of Tehuantepec on the south, with a lateral ex-tent from the Black Hills upon the east front of the Rocky Mountains through the different ranges to the Piedmont or Coast Range of the Pacific. It consists of interlying valleys between great ranges of mountains, whose flanks and shoulders are covered with a growth of pine timber, above whose everlasting verdure splintered cliffs and crags and pinnacles, as the Senator from California explained the other day, arise into the regions of everlasting snow. The occupations of the people are identical. They are all engaged in the extraction of the precious metals from the placers and from the lodes in the sides of those mountains. They all have a similar interest and a similar desire to obtain possession of the treasures of these forests that the people have in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territory of Washington. As I said, they have no representatives on this floor. I desire, if it is necessary for the people of the Pacific slope to be honest by act of Congress, that the inhabitants of these Territories who are excluded shall have the same privilege and the same opportunity; and I move—and I trust I shall have the through the different ranges to the Piedmont or Coast Range of the the same opportunity; and I move—and I trust I shall have the assent of the supporters of this bill—to strike out in lines 3 and 4 of section 1 the words "within the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory," and in lines 11, 12, and 13, the words "and in all other Territories of the United States not exceeding forty acres to any one person, corporation, or association of persons;" so as to make the provisions of this bill harmonize with themselves and extend its beneficial effects, if they are beneficial, over the entire portion of the country which is subject to the same material conditions. I think, sir, there can be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think it is hardly worth while for me to make any remarks on the comparative honesty of the people of my State and those of Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. That remark has been made before. I desire to call attention to the remarks of the Senator from California. this bill was before the Senate on the 16th instant he said:

I have received representations from thousands of my fellow-citizens, asking for an opportunity to be honest men in this regard.

Asking that an act of Congress may be passed to enable them to be honest!

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably so, and I will give credit to the citizens of Kansas for being honest men when they diligently seek an opportunity. It seems from my assertion that the people of my State desire that opportunity. I have heard the Senator and other Senators from States situated like Kansas decla'm against the cor-ruptions in their States under the pre-emption law. I boldly assert that in my State no such corruptions ever have existed under the preemption law.

The Senator has made an extremely illogical speech. He attacks The Senator has made an extremely lllogical speech. He attacks this bill as something monstrous, and then he wants to extend it to the whole United States—his own State as well as the State of California. That may be a reason why his amendment should be adopted, perhaps; but he is illogical. If the bill is a good bill and he desires it, I have no objection to its being extended to his State; but if he desires it to be extended to his State, it seems to me that it is inconsistent then to say that it is a bad bill, and to be so extremely restive at the present of its present. It believe it is a good bill and will apply a polynomial to the property of its present. the prospect of its passage. I believe it is a good bill, and will apply well wherever there are timber lands not already grabbed by speculators. I have no objection to extending it to his State.

I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to striking out the provision restricting the amount of timber which may be taken under the bill in the Territories, except Washington, to forty acres, although the Delegates have assured me (one of whom sits at my right now) that their people desire this feature to remain. But if the Senate shall esteem it unfair to the Territories, notwithstanding what their Delegates may say, to retain this feature, I certainly shall not insist that it shall be retained.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the Senator from California state what is the purport of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Kansas proposes to strike out the restriction in this bill as to its application to California, Oregon, and Washington Territory, which would make it a general bill applying to all the States and Territories.

Mr. OGLESBY. One hundred and sixty acres?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir, and then to strike out the limitation of forty acres to a person, corporation, or association of persons in the other Territories, and upon the latter I was remarking.

It may be, as the Senator from Kansas says, that the Delegates misrepresent their Territories. They may be very unintelligent men, as he would seem to imply. Years of residence of each in his own Terri-tory may not have given them that accurate and valuable knowledge which the Senator acquired by taking a horseback ride over one or two which the Senator acquired by taking a horseback ride over one or two of them. The Senator's perceptions are far superior to theirs, it is obvious from his manner of stating their misrepresentation of their Territories, and his own superior knowledge acquired in this exhaustive way. I admire knowledge wherever I see it. If the Senator can outweigh eight Delegates, certainly do not let us listen to those Delegates. To be sure, they have no seats on this floor. I admit that is their disadvantage, but I do not know that it is any reason why they should not be kindly listened to by Senators. They say that the wants of their constituents run in a certain direction, and are unanimous upon that. It seems to me that is entitled to some consideration, although a that. It seems to me that is entitled to some consideration, although a Senator may have traveled over some of those Territories on a mule. I admit that that is a proud eminence; it gives ample opportunity for observation. There is nothing, except the ears of the mule, in your way of getting a very extensive prospect. As I said, I bow with all submission to the superior knowledge that is acquired in that favorable way. But, after all that is said and admitted, I still claim that eight intelligent men from the Territories may possibly know something about it also, and I understand that the committee were moved to this restriction by the unanimous request of those Delegates. I respect that request, and it will govern my vote; but I do not think that I can object, so far as the interests of my own people are concerned, if it is stricken out. If the bill is so beneficial, make it a gen-

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from California says that he admires knowledge wherever it is found. I can only say that in that respect I fear that his self-contempt must be very painful. I in that respect I fear that his self-contempt must be very painful. I do not propose to indulge in any contest of witticism or facetiousness with the Senator from California, but simply to say that I presume an inspection that is derived from a personal knowledge and acquaintance with a country will suffice to tell whether it is timbered or whether it is barren. I do not know what the receptive or perceptive faculties of the Senator from California are; but I venture to say that no person who has ever traversed the Territory of Colorado or the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico can be ignorant of the fact that they are clothed in many portions with very heavy and vol. fact that they are clothed in many portions with very heavy and valuable forests of pine. And whatever may be the opinion of the Delegates from those Territories, I add from the testimony of Lieutenant Wheeler, whose explorations have been continued over that country for the last seven or eight years, that in the Territory of New Mexico alone there is one plateau of nearly three hundred miles in length and from sixty to seventy-five miles in width densely covered with a growth of pine that has no superior anywhere upon this continent. It is very possible that none of the Delegates from these Territories may be aware of this fact. I do not pretend to say whether they are or not; but I affirm from personal knowledge that very large tracts of the Territories that I have named are covered with valuable forests; and if the provisions of this bill are valuable for the people of California and Oregon and Washington Territory, then I insist that the inhabitants of the other Territories, who are engaged in similar avocations and have the same necessities, ought at least to be similarly favored with the States named in the bill.

I have no desire to resist further this passage of the bill that is now before us; for, as I said, I think it is a foregone conclusion that it is to pass, although in my judgment it ought not to pass. The Senator from California said that my remarks previously were illogical; that while I said the bill was a bad bill, yet I was advocating its extension over portions of territory not named in its original provisions. I was illogical to the extent of desiring that the provisions of this bill, if they are beneficial, shall be made as nearly uniform in their operations as possible, and not be made limited and partial by our action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.
Mr. KELLY. I wish to say a few words in behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, because this bill has been characterized by the Senator from Kansas as containing something disingenuous. That is certainly a reflection upon that committee. The remark presupposes that they did not know what they were doing; or if they did, that that they did not know what they were doing; or if they did, that they were acting covertly and insincerely.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not mean to say that at all.

Mr. KELLY. The Senator says he made no such reflection. Then I will simply say, as I have already explained, that this bill is but a transcript of one that passed the last House of Representatives and came to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate too late for action. It was introduced by me at an early day of the present session, because it was a bill that I knew had received full consideration in the House of Representatives at the last session. When the former bill was sent to the Senate, the territorial Delegates in the last Congress, at least a number of them, one or two not being members of this Congress, stated to me that it was the desire of the Delegates from the Territories that the quantity of land there should be limited to forty acres for each person who should make application for it; and it was at the request of these Delegates that the quantity was so limited in the House of Representatives. It may be they did not know, as has been suggested by the Senator from California, what was their duty to their constituents; that they knew nothing about the character of the country they represented; but I venture to say that they certainly knew one fact, that if the timber lands there were given in any large quantities to individual claimants, it would very soon exhaust the timber lands in those Territories.

Further, I would say that it is an undeniable fact that the timber lands along the Pacific coast are in far greater extent than they are in the Territories. I have passed over both. I do not say that I have been over every portion of the Territories of the United States; but been over every portion of the Territories of the United States; but I take it for granted that the character of the country as we cross it on a railway is something like the remaining portions that we have not seen. I am well satisfied in my own mind that there is not timber enough along the line of the railway, within twenty miles of it, to make ties on that road, at least not for many years to come; and that it is but just and right when we are legislating for Territories that have no voice in the Senate, that we should pay some heed to the recommendations of those who do represent them. It was simply to carry out their ideas as to what the law ought to be that I introto carry out their ideas as to what the law ought to be, that I introduced the bill with the limitation in it.

I do not know that I need say anything further. It is no interest to me specially that they should be limited to that quantity. I am not a resident in either of the Territories, nor do I expect to be; and I am not legislating, therefore, to gratify my own wishes, but to carry out the views of others who have no representation here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, but I should vote for it if I were at liberty to do so.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) Upon the representations that have been made by the Senator from Oregon, of which I was not fully advised before, that all the Delegates from the Territories desire the bill to pass as in its present shape, I shall vote against the amendment I offered.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; which resulted-yeas 0, nays 45; as follows:

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Ednunds, Gordon, Hamlin, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Wallace, West, and Windom—27.

So the amendment was rejected. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WABASH AND ERIE CANAL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will now call up the resolution I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary this morning.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to Congress whether any act is necessary to protect the property or interest of the United States in the Wabash and Eric Canal from Terre Haute, Indiana, to the State of Ohio; and that he be requested in the mean time to take such measures as he may deem necessary to have the sale of the said canal, which is advertised for the 24th instant, postponed.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the first part of the resolution, but it seems to me that the last part of it, by which the Attorney-General is requested to take such measures as he may deem necessary to suspend or postpone the sale of certain property belonging to the Wabash and Eric Canal Company or to the trustees of that canal, ought not to be adopted.

The decree under which that sale is ordered is a decree of the circuit court of the United States at the suit of certain bondholders whose debts, by virtue of two acts of the Legislature of Indiana, one of 1846, and the other of 1847, are placed as a lien upon this canal, its property, and its revenues. In the suit in which this decree has been entered, the only parties are the bondholders or the stockholders of the canal stock and the trustees of the Wabash and Eric Canal—an incorporation created under the acts to which I have referred. Of course the interests of no other party can be affected by the decree, neither of the United States nor of any other party that may have an interest inasmuch as they are not parties to the proceeding.

It seems to me that the latter clause of this resolution might simply embarrass the action of the court in the execution of its decree by inducing the Attorney-General to take some steps to interfere with it without effecting any good to anybody. Certainly whatever rights or interests the United States may have with reference to this property remain unaffected by the decree, because the United States has never been a party to the proceeding. Therefore I move that the last clause of the resolution be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Ingalls in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the resolution by striking out the

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I know nothing about this subject; but I was directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report this resolution and to ask for its passage to-day. It appears that this public work was aided in its construction by a land grant from the United States and that in the grant it was provided:

That the said canal when completed shall be and forever remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or charges whatever for any property of the United States or person in their service passing through the sam

Therefore, it is very clear that the United States for a consideration has a direct interest in this property. It is usual for the United States, when it makes a grant for a public road, to have a provision of that grant, which provision during the recent war was found of great value. In some cases the tolls would have amounted to near a million of dollars, which this provision saved to the United States.

Now it is moved to strike out that part of the resolution which requests the Attorney-General, if he deems it necessary, to have a postponement of the sale. My friend from Indiana says that the United States cannot be affected. I do not know that. If the Government states cannot be affected. I do not know that. If the Government stands by, sees this canal sold to a railroad company for the avowed purpose of making a railroad instead of a canal of it, I think there might be some plausible plea to say, "You must not insist upon your right in this canal;" and if we do insist and thereby the purchase becomes of less value to the purchaser, I think the purchase rwould have a good right to say, "You ought to have given us notice that you had this claim, and not permitted us to pay our money when we do not get the title that we anticipated." It seems to me that the resolution asking the Attorney-General to inform Congress what our resolution asking the Attorney-General to inform Congress what our rights are and declaring that until we get that information matters shall remain in statu quo is a proper resolution to pass.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I do not see how any right of the United States can be affected by this decree or by any proceedings under it. Whatever those rights are they are statutory, and, consequently, public and known to all parties. Now, it is only when a person having a secret claim or title to property stands by and permits it to be purchased by an innocent party that he waives his right or claim.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. McDONALD.

Yes, sir. Who is to suffer if the receiver's sale, now to take Mr. CONKLING.

place on the 24th, is postponed for a week or ten days?

Mr. McDONALD. I do not know, I will say to the Senator from New York, that any person is to suffer, except that it involves the expense of a new publication, which amounts to something in this case, because, under the decree of the court, it is required that the sale shall be published, not only in certain papers in the State of Indiana, but in certain money centers in the East—New York and other

Mr. CONKLING. No new advertisement will be necessary.

Mr. McDONALD. I should think it would require a new advertisement if the sale is postponed.

Mr. CONKLING. O, yes; but I submit to the honorable Senator that a mere notice of postponement without any further advertising would be everything called for.

Mr. McDONALD. But this notice of postponement and of the new day of sale must have equal publicity with the original notice of sale.

Then, again, I do not understand how the Attorney-General could undertake to suspend the sale unless he should make the United States a party to the proceeding by some supplemental bill or peti-tion setting forth such an interest as would authorize a chancellor to interfere on the behalf of a petitioner and to enjoin the sale. This is the execution of a decree of the court; and it is proposed by this resolution to vest in the Attorney-General some kind of vague authority to interfere with that execution. It seems to me that this is a matter which we have no particular control over; that he could as well act without this resolution of the Senale, because that can confer upon him no legislative authority; and if he should undertake to act under the discretionary advice (for that is all that this amounts to) which this resolution proposes to give to him, it would be a very grave ques-tion how far the United States should make itself a party litigant in this chancery proceeding brought by the creditors of the canal lands and funds for the purpose of having them reduced for distribution upon their debt.

The first part of the resolution is proper enough; but the latter part, it seems to me, is somewhat beyond the province of the Senate, and, so far as it undertakes to give advice to the Attorney-General, may involve the United States in difficulty.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, some days ago a petition was presented in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, praying action on this subject. In that way it comes, I will say to the Senator from Indiana as he seemed to inquire how it comes, that legislative action is proposed. Citizens of the United States, acting under a customary right, have brought to the attention of the Senate a certain state of facts. In outline, they are that the Government of the United States having an interest and a pecuniary interest in a work the structure of which the Government has assisted, which by statute and by compact was to remain perpetually a public highway and a water-way, that work is about to be disposed of or is in danger of being disposed of so that it will be filled up and cease to be for any of the purposes and for all the advantages contemplated in its structure. Upon that state of facts the petitioners, ask our interposition

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDonald] says that the Attorney General has power to commence a suit and that he needs no legisla-tive direction. That may be; but when information is addressed to us and we are appealed to act in regard to it, it will hardly do, I submit, for us to turn around and say that the information might have been carried to the Attorney-General; that he might have gained it for himself; that he might have done so or thus; and therefore al-though the 24th of this present month is the day on which this sale is to take place unless arrested, we will fold our arms and suffer it to proceed. Instead of that, the committee thought it right to do two things: first to request from the Attorney-General such information and advice as he could give; and second—and now I hope the Senate will especially observe the function of the latter branch of this resolution—to see to it that, while we were acquiring that information, all opportunity to use it shall not forever pass away. The purpose of the latter part of this resolution is to retain everything in statu quo so that if it turns out that there is something which can be done and ought to be done, we shall not be too late to do it.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from New York in what mode it is proposed that the Attorney-General shall arrest

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, were I Attorney-General, and had I had the opportunity under this resolution to investigate that, I hope I should be prepared to answer my honorable friend. It is because we are not prepared to answer that we request the Attorney-General to qualify himself to answer that very question. If it turns out that the statutory rights of the United States and the other interests which we are bound to consider will survive despite all sale or proceeding which has been undertaken or can be, so be it; we rest upon our oars, and we enforce the rights of the Government hereafter, if the legislative branch of the Government is called upon to enforce them. Suppose, however, it turns out, on the other hand, that the Government, in the protection of its own interest not only, but in the preservation of interests at large which it is bound to conserve, ought to interpose not only to postpone but to arrest and prevent this sale, and prevent the obliteration of this water-channel and its being acand prevent the conferation of this water-channel and its being acquired by a railway company or somebody else having interests antagonistic to it, then the proposition of my honorable friend is that in the mean time, blindfold, without knowing anything about it, we shall give up, or suffer to depart, which is just as bad, all opportunity to do anything except what we may do in spite of those proceedings at which this resolution is aimed.

I have heard from an intelligent and reliable in the sum of th

I have heard from an intelligent and reliable informant a statement of the facts touching this matter. I do not think it worth while to detail them here, because this resolution is one merely of inquiry, one cautioning the Attorney-General to observe this proceeding, asking him to give such advice as he can, on information in regard to it, and in the mean time if he finds it necessary to take any proceedings to postpone this sale, and finds that there are proper proceedings which he can take for that purpose, he takes them. That is all.

I asked the Senator from Indiana who was to suffer by a postponement of this sale. He says he does not know that anybody is to suffer; and he reminds us that if it is postponed the same thing is involved which is always involved in postponing a mortgage or execution sale—the necessity of putting in a newspaper an advertisement to the effect that the above sale is postponed for one week, or for ten days, or for three weeks, or whatever the time may be. The Senator says that involves expense. It does. If the advertisement has been made in half a dozen newspapers, this receiver, or whoever acts for him, would be compelled to indite a brief note to each of these papers, asking them to say, at the foot of the advertisement, that the sale is to stand over for ten days, or whatever the time might be arranged between him and the Attorney-General. It strikes me, that for an objection so small as that, an inconvenience and an expense so very trivial, it will hardly do to say that what seems to be an important work to the citizens certainly of two large States, and in less degree to the citizens of all the States, shall be exposed to the hazard of being swept away or entangled in costly and protracted litigation and controversy, all of which might be avoided by sending this resolution to the Attorney-General, and letting him, by letter or telegraph, arrange for a trifling postponement, which will give him interval enough to satisfy himself that something ought to be done, or that nothing can be done. Therefore I hope that the latter clause of the resolution will stand, as it seems to me essential to the first, as it would be a vain motion for us to allow this whole proceeding to take place, which we know it will within two or three days, while we are making an inquiry which probably would be of no avail to anybody when the occasion had passed by.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is a matter that deeply concerns the people of a large section of the State of Ohio, and it also very largely concerns the people of a still larger section of the State of Indiana; and though in a somewhat remote yet in a very importor indiana; and though in a somewhat remote yet in a very important degree it concerns the people of the East along the lines of transportation through Lake Erie and the New York railroads and canals. The General Government granted to the State of Indiana and to the State of Ohio a very liberal subsidy in land to aid in the construction of a canal from the Wabash River to Lake Erie. The State of Indiana was particularly solicitous for the construction of that improvement, the greater part of which lay in the State of Indiana because it gave the greater part of which lay in the State of Indiana, because it gave her an outlet to Lake Erie which she could not have except by a public improvement passing in part through the State of Ohio. She was therefore particularly solicitous for the construction of this work; and the State of Ohio, meeting her in the most liberal spirit, passed an act for the construction within the State of Ohio of her part of the canal, called the Maumee and Erie Canal. The canal was accordingly constructed, and has proved of very great advantage to the people of Ohio in the northwestern section of the State, but of far more advantage to the people of Indiana in the section through which it passes. The canal was leased, as I understand, by the State of Indiana, and the lessees have in some way or other encumbered their lease, by a mortgage I believe. In some way or other it is now set up for sale. I have not learned the particulars of that, but I suppose it is to be a sale of the interest of the lessees in the canal. Now it is the belief of some who have written to me on the subject, that if this canal shall be purchased it will be purchased by persons in the interest of certain railroad companies, and that the canal will be utterly abandoned so far as that portion of it that lies in the State of Indiana is concerned, thus rendering to a great extent the portion in Ohio, upon which she has expended many millions of dollars and toward the construction of which as well as of the Indiana part the General Government contributed largely, comparatively useless.

Under these circumstances it does seem to me that, if the General Government has any interest whatsoever to be subserved by protecting that improvement to which she so largely and beneficially contributed, we ought to pay attention to that interest.

Now, what is the direct interest of the United States? In the rants of land made to aid in the construction of canals in the State of Ohio, not this canal alone, but the Ohio and Eric Canal, and the Miami Canal extending from Cincinnati to the lake, and this Maumee Canal, the condition was put into the land grant that the arms, munitions, and troops of the United States should pass toll free over those canals. Before the late civil war the State of Ohio had leased her canals; she did not sell them; she did not put an end to them; but see leased them, and by her lease required them to be kept in as good condition for navigation as they were at the date of the lease. This provision in favor of the United States, that her arms, munitions of war, and troops should pass over those canals free of any charge, I was assured by a gentleman, perhaps the best informed on the subject, for he was the general manager of the lessees of the canals, saved the United States during the late civil war a very large sum of money, and, if my memory is not at fault, it was over $600,000. The amount could be told to a cent, for all boats had to receive clearances, whether they contained a cargo that paid toll or not; whether they contained individuals upon whom tolls were chargeable or not; and the amount which was saved to the United States, if my memory is not at fault, was somewhere near $600,000. That much was saved to the United States Government on the Ohio canals by using those canals instead of railroads in the transportation of munitions of war and the troops of the United States. I have no doubt that there was some saving over this particular canal in question.

The United States therefore having given a large land subsidy for the construction of this improvement, reserving no specific consideration, no consideration apart from the general good and this one consideration that her arms and munitions of war and troops should pass toll free over it, has a direct interest in the preservation of that great public work. I think no one who wishes to see cheap transportation, who wishes to see a rivalry between the water transportation and the railroad transportation, can desire to see that great improvement fall into disuse. I may say in respect to one particular subject of transportation, that of ship timber, that this canal is the most valuable mode of transportation in all the State of Ohio and has transported more timber of that kind for ship-building to the ports on

Under these circumstances I think it is right that we should look Under these circumstances I think it is right that we should look into this matter; and in what better way can we look into it than by directing the attention of the Attorney-General to it? We prejudge nothing by that. We do not direct the Attorney-General to institute any proceeding unless there is good reason for doing it, unless he have a good ground for doing it; and what possible injury to anybody can result from his investigating the subject and taking any steps that in his investigation shall be precessary to protect the judgment, after an investigation, shall be necessary to protect the interests of the United States? I think my friend from Indiana will find that his people are more interested than even the people of Ohio in the preservation of this great improvement, in not allowing it to fall into disuse, in not allowing it to become purchased by any railroad corporation whatever with a view to its disuse, as so large a portion of the Pennsylvania Canal has been disused since it fell into the ownership of a railroad company.

I hope therefore, Mr. President, that there will be no objection to this resolution. It is not mandatory in its character so as to commit us to any expense, nor does it interfere with any private right; it simply calls on the law officer of the Government to take care that the interests of the United States shall be protected.

The amendment was rejected.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as reported by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen.]

The resolution was agreed to.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, at the suggestion of Senators understanding the merits of the measure, I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 32, a bill which was brought up once before and at the instance of some Senator laid over that he might look at it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 32) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts, and for the punishment of crimes committed by and against Indians, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 10 of section 1, to insert after the word "law" the word "or," and strike out "or executive order;" so as to make the section read:

That except as to crimes committed in the Indian country, or upon any Indian reservation, the punishment of which is expressly provided for by laws of the United States, the general laws of the United States as to the punishment of crimes committed in any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, except the District of Columbia, shall be in force in and upon each and every Indian reservation established by law or treaty stipulation within the limits of any Territory of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish merely to say that the other day this bill was laid over at my request, and since that time, on such examination as I have given the bill, it seems to me a proper one. I shall make no opposition to its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section 2, line 4, after the word "law" to insert "or," and to strike out in line 5 "or executive order, without the written consent of the officer or agent having charge thereof;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. That any person not an Indian who shall cut or remove, or in any manner carry away, any wood, trees, or timber of any kind, or stone, grass, or any other material, from an Indian reservation established by law or treaty stipulation within the limits of any State or Territory of the United States, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not rise to oppose this particular amendment but to make an inquiry in reference to the second section as it will stand when amended. It seems to me that if the words just read are stricken out we shall get into difficulty on some of the reservations; as, for example, on the Sioux reservation. There we have a considerable military force who are entirely independent of the Indian agent. It is necessary for the support of the officers and men to cut timber and build houses, and to cut wood, &c. It seems to me that if the second section stands as read it would have the effect to prevent any such use of the timber on the reservation. I call the attention of the Senate to this difficulty, as it appears to me to be, if this bill shall pass. It applies to-

Any person not an Indian who shall cut or remove, or in any manner carry away, ny wood, trees, or timber of any kind, or stone, grass, or any other material.

It is necessary, in order to maintain a cavalry force, for instance, on many of the reservations, to cut grass and put up hay. There may be some explanation that I do not see. On the face of the section, it occurs to me to be rather a dangerous provision.

Mr. HOWE. I do not quite see that there is the danger to be apprehended of which the Senator from Iowa speaks. That amendment I think is necessary in one point of view. I think the Senator from Iowa will agree with me that there should not be the discretion vested in the head of the Indian Bureau, or in the head of the Executive Government, to authorize the cutting of and the traffic in timber from Indian reservations.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that.
Mr. HOWE. It seemed to me that that amendment was necessary to avoid that conclusion. If there is a necessity for authorizing the cutting of timber or the cutting of grass for the use of Government agents, that may very well be provided for. There may be such cases; I am sure that I am not prepared to say that there are not; but still I think the amendment should be agreed to, and then this authority which the Senator thinks necessary should be provided by as separate amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the amendment. I think it would be perhaps quite important to make this amendment. I do not think an ordinary agent ought to have authority to allow the cutting of timber

Mr. HOWE. A proviso at the close of the section, if the Senator will draw one, providing that this section shall not apply to the cutting of timber or grass, for the use of the troops of the Government or the officers of the Government, would answer his purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the word "any" in the first line of section 3 to the end of the section, in the following words:

United States marshal is hereby authorized and required to remove from any Indian reservation located in the districtor Territory of which he is marshal, any person found thereon contrary to law, upon being requested, in writing, so to do by the Indian agent or superintendent under whose control the reservation in question

person found upon any Indian reservation contrary to law, and who shall r fuse or neglect to remove therefrom upon the request of the agent or superintendent hav-ing charge of the reserve, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon con-viction thereof in any court having jurisdiction, shall be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. While the Senator from Iowa is preparing his amendment I wish to make one statement; and make it in the hearing of the Senators from California [Mr. SARGENT] and Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN,] which I concede in the outset does not bear particularly on the merits

A short time ago when a bill in which the Senator from California was somewhat interested was before the Senate, I renewed the state-ment that I made last week that the Land Office had not abandoned the practice of offering lands, under your general laws, at public sale, and I expected every moment the evidence from the Land Office to verify that statement of mine. It did not come until that subject had passed away from the consideration of the Senate. I now hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he states as a matter of fact that no such offers have been made in Michigan within the last ten years, but that such offers have been made in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, and by way of corroborating the statement sends me the proclamations.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator have the letter read?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I will send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This proceeding is irregular and can only proceed by unanimous consent, another bill being pending. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The letter will be read.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., February 19, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your late inquiry, I have the honor to state that there have been no offerings of public lands in the State of Michigan under a proclamation of the President during the last ten years. During that period there have been proclamations by the President for land sales in Minnesota and Wisconsin, four in the former and two in the latter, numbered 723, 730, 743, 760, 771, and 776. Printed copies of these proclamations are sent herewith.

In reference to the sale of the Fort Howard military reservation, in November, 1864, it appears that the highest price received for any lot was that given for the fort site with the buildings thereon, contents 3.04 acres which was appraised at $3,000, and was sold at $6,400. The next highest rate per acre was received for lot No. 282, containing one acre, which was appraised at $30 and was sold at $44.50.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. K. LIPPINCOTT, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. T. O. Howe, United States Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I have only to add that here are the eight proclama-tions of sales made within the last ten years. The earliest one of this series was dated in 1867; the latest one was dated in 1873. This letter shows that a single tract on which there were buildings, the tract being appraised at $3,000, was sold at public sale and brought $6,400. There was no combination. There was just one tract of that kind to be bid for, and there was no possibility of effecting a combination. They did not effect a combination so as to prevent running that up

$3,400 above the appraised value.

Mr. SARGENT. One word. The Senator has very ingeniously proved what I asserted this morning, so far as I have had opportunity to examine these proclamations which he has sent me at my request. The first two were under special laws relating to military reservations and land reserved for school purposes entirely exceptional to the cases to which I referred-Indian lands, &c. All the cases in Wisconsin were of that character. There was no controversy between the Senator and myself as to them. I really hoped, as the Senator was so anxious to put himself right and derived so much gratification from doing so, that he would succeed. I am a little disappointed that my friend is still in error, for I know I can cheerfully give way to his superior knowledge in such matters, and I am sorry to say that that consolation is denied the Senator. These were not general public lands of the United States to which I referred, but they are Indian reservations, &c.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator mean to say that those were all sales under special laws?

Mr. SARGENT. I have not bad time to examine them all.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator will examine them before he makes that statement.

Mr. SARGENT. The one now in hand was in Minnesota.

Mr. HOWE. Turn to the next one.
Mr. SARGENT. I have not time. This was a proclamation for Mr. SARGENI. I have not time. This was a proclamation for "the sale of valuable lands in that part of the Sioux Indian reservation on the Minnesota River, Minnesota," lying and in the district of lands subject to sale at Saint Peter. That is the first. The next is the sale of valuable pine lands in the State of Minnesota, which I the sale of valuable pine lands in the State of Minnesota, which I understand was under a special statute.

Mr. HOWE. Where is the special statute?

Mr. SARGENT. I will find it if the Senator wants it.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to see it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is the same as I called attention to in his own State, under which the sale of 1864 took place and the one under which the sale of 1872 took place. That there may have been here and these during the last twenty years an executional see and there during the last twenty years an exceptional case, even where lands belonging to the public domain have been sold, I do not deny; but I say—and this was the point which was made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon and myself—that the policy has been abandoned; and where it has been adopted it has been in a little case, an exception which would really go to prove the general rule. Here is one:

In pursuance of law, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, hereby declare and make known that a public sale of valuable pine land—

It is not put up as ordinary land.

The next is:

In pursuance of law I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, hereby declare and make known that a public sale will be held at Bayfield, in the State of Wisconsin, commencing Monday, the 17th day of June next, for the disposal of the sections and parts of sections herein enumerated, not previously disposed of at a price not less than $2.50 per acre.

Showing that they were reserved lands and not under the general statute. There is but one left and I will not look at that one, so as to give the Senator some chance to be correct, which I really believe

Mr. HOWE. Now I want to state (and that is all the time I shall take) that there is not any sort of excuse for the intimation that there was a special statute for making seven of those sales. I rather suspect there was a special statute for making one of them-one out of

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to my friend that we had better refer this matter to a committee to settle it. Mr. HOWE. I prefer to have the facts stated here in the presence

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Bill No. 32 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 2:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent the cutting of such timber or grass or the use of such stone as may be necessary for the purposes of the Army or for the use of the several agencies located on any such reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. KELLY. I hope the further consideration of this bill will be postponed. It is one of importance to the people of the Pacific coast, where there are many Indian reservations, and especially section 3 of the bill, which provides:

That any person found upon any Indian reservation contrary to law, and who shall refuse or neglect to remove therefrom upon the request of the agent or superintendent-

shall be punished. In Oregon, if we take the Umatilla reservation, for instance, there is a public highway through it, upon which there is a daily line of coaches transporting the overland mail, and teams are passing constantly to and fro, going across that reservation, camping upon it at times during the night and going on in the morning. If it is intended to prohibit the passage of persons over or camping upon it in traveling along the public highway, I object to the section.

Again, there is a military wagon-road passing through the Malheur Indian reservation. The United States have granted lands to a company for the purpose of constructing a road, and it has been built. It is a regular line of travel through the reservation. I will say fur-ther that this Malheur Indian reservation was located upon those lands after the title to the lands was acquired by the railroad company. Surely, that being within the boundaries of an Indian reservation, persons should have the right to pass and repass, should have the right to occupy their own lands that are within the limits of the reservation; and yet this bill would prohibit them from doing so.

The same facts apply to the Klamath Indian reservation. a public road leading throught that and lands acquired by the wagon-road company within the boundaries of that reservation.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion which I think will relieve all his apprehensions?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOWE. This section does not preclude anybody from occupying his own lands, let them be situated where they may; it only applies to the case of those who shall squat on Indian lands, not to pass over them, but settle upon them and refuse to leave when the Government tells them to leave. That is all.

Mr. KELLY. I have in my mind another matter. Upon the Nez Percés' reservation there is a tract of six hundred and forty acres of land that was granted to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and that society have transferred it to Mr. William G. Langford, who is now the owner of the land. It is claimed adversely by the Indian agent. Mr. Langford has constructed buildings upon it; and the question is, could the agent order the owner of that land from the tract that is claimed adversely by the United States, or rather by the Indian agent? for I do not understand that the United States claim the land because they have parted with it by a grant. And yet, according to the terms of this section, the owner of that land could be driven away from it.

I hope there may be time given to examine the bill more closely. It was only laid on our tables this morning, and I think we should have a little further time to examine it and consider its bearings upon the important questions involved. So far as the general features of the bill are concerned I have no objection to it, but I wish it to be guarded.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee to section 3 was adopted. My attention has just been called to this bill, and particularly to this branch of it. It seems to me that we ought to consider it a little more carefully, especially with reference to its application to what is known as the Sioux reservation. There are about two thousand people, or it is said that there are about two thousand people, or it is said that there are about two thousand people, on the Sioux reservation digging about the Black Hills for gold. This section gives to the proper court of the United States jurisdisdiction to summarily punish these people. I doubt very much whether it is worth while at this time to enter upon any such legislation, and I trust we shall not do it until enter upon any such legislation, and I trust we shall not do it until enter upon any such legislation, and I trust we shall not do it until we establish some policy with reference to the Sioux Indians, whom we are now supporting by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States, and we shall doubtless be obliged to continue to support them for some years to come. It does seem to me that we ought not to ingraft upon a bill of this character a provision which will affect that reservation until the matter is considered more carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Sen-

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, sir. I only call attention to the fact.

Mr. WINDOM. There seems to be a desire to give this bill further consideration, and I believe a pretty general wish to let it go over. I therefore ask that it may be informally passed over, that I may make

Mr. HOWE. If anybody wants the bill postponed until to-morrow for the purpose of considering it, I have no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that it be postponed, in order that I may call up a bill from the Committee on Appropriations to pay the crippled and disabled soldiers now in the employment of the House of Representatives.

HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WINDOM. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1802) making an appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876, to report the same back without amendment and to ask for its present

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I am requested to make a brief explanation of this bill. At the close of the Fortieth Congress, or about the close of the Fortieth Congress, a resolution was offered by a member from Illinois, now the Senator on my left, [Mr. Logan,] to provide for the payment during the recess of three crippled and disabled soldiers who were then in the employ of the House of Representatives, in the folding-room. Since that time various additions have been made to this class of employés. By a second resolution two were added to the number; by a third, four; by another resolution, three; and finally two more, making a total of fourteen crippled and disabled soldiers, all of whom are under the employ of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives.

Appropriations have been made during the last three years as follows: From March 4, to December 1, 1873, $12,600, for payment during that recess. The next appropriation was from July 1, to December 1, 1874, $10,353.76, during another recess of Congress. The last was from April 1, to December 6, 1875, providing for their payment during the last recess. I do not find in the regular appropriation bills any appropriation for paying them during the session of Congress, and upon inquiry at the other end of the Capitol that is explained by the apon inquiry at the other end of the Capitol that is explained by the fact that the House has paid them out of its contingent fund during the sessions. That contingent fund being too small at this time, a bill has been sent to us providing for their payment from the 6th day of last December to the 30th of June next. There are now thirteen of these persons employed on the gallery floor of the House of Representatives and one at the lobby-door, making in all fourteen, all of whom are in the regular employ of the House and have received no compensation since the session began. It is very desirable, if the bill meets the approval of the Senate, that it should pass as soon as possible. sible.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the 3.65 per cent. bond resolution, and ask its present consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided," in line 4 of the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the said commissioners are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind, the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia: And provided further. That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit of the payment of the said board, approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and all compensation allowed to said board of audit for their service

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state the condition of this matter as it is now reported, by saying that the only changes made in the former report are first by reciting the several statutes whose provisions are to be repealed so as to make it certain that those provisions which were contemplated by the former report to have been repealed shall all be included. The second change is that, so far as the functions of the board as to auditing any of these claims and the functions of the board as to auditing any of these claims and certifying them are concerned, they are absolutely repealed by this act, to take effect on the passage of the act, whereas by the former report they were authorized to go on and audit certain classes of claims. By this act they will be prevented from so doing. Then it provides that at the end of thirty days all books and papers of every description in their possession shall be turned over to the commissioners of the District. These are the only changes made in the report. In all other respects it remains as before.

Mr. COOPER. I move that the report be laid over and printed.

Mr. COOPER. I move that the report be laid over and printed.
Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the honorable Senator from Tennessee whether he cannot forego that. The report has been printed except the modifications just stated. I feel myself the injustice and humiliation that people having bonds of the United States, on which interest has now been due for twenty-one days, cannot receive payment of their coupons, every one of which could be protested. The money is lying for them. I do not want to adjourn over the 22d of February, Washington's birthday, leaving this obligation unpaid. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] shakes his head. The good old steady land of Connecticut never would allow that in regard to one of her State bonds. I believe she has never failed promptly to pay her pub-lic obligations; and yet here is an obligation of the District of Columbia, indorsed by the Government of the United States, which for twenty-one days lies dishonored, its coupons unpaid, its interest due.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to say that the Legislature of Connecticut would investigate the circumstances of such an issue as this before it would consent to pay either principal

Mr. SHERMAN. But they would take care to examine into the in-debtedness before the interest became due. The State of Connecticut never would allow it to stand dishonored after it was due. Congress was examining this months before it was due, and it ought to be paid; and I think the Senate ought not to adjourn until this report has been finally acted upon. As I understand the Senator from Maine, the only modifications made in the printed report laid on our table a few days ago are modifications made to carry out the view of the Senate; so we have before us practically the bill as passed by the Senate, and I think we ought not to consume further time with it. shall vote against the motion to print, because it would cause delay. Mr. BAYARD. I have been absent from the Chamber, and during my absence I understand a report has been brought in by the chair man of the committee of conference, the Senator from Maine. I would like to know the features of the present report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator was not in his seat when I stated them.

Mr. BAYARD. I was absent unavoidably.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can state in a moment the changes in the former report of the committee. One is to make certain the provisions as to the repeal of the board of audit. The Senator may remember that the Senator from Vermont suggested that the recital in the former report, referring only to one of the statutes, might leave a question whether all the powers conferred on the board of audit were repealed.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend show me the difference between

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will remember that the former report made referred to the statute of June 20, 1874, while there were two subsequent statutes, one of December 21, 1874, and the other of March 3,1875, extending the powers of the board of audit. Those latter were not referred to, and thus a question arose whether the powers and functions of the board derived from those two statutes might not continue. This embraces all the statutes on the subject; so that all the powers devolving on the board under either of the statutes are now absolutely repealed, and the functions of the board under any of these statutes are put an end to, and after thirty days from this time they are to surrender their books, documents, and papers to the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

precise variations of the former report.

Mr. BAYARD. The act of June 20, 1874, which placed the District of Columbia under the government of a system of commissioners, and created with that a board of audit, was supplemented by an act of the following session in December, that extended the period in which the board of audit should have power over the unsettled debt or the uncertified debt of the District. With all due respect for the committee of conference and the chairman who has stated the fact, I do both that including in this report a repeal of the act of December, 1874, extending for a period of ninety days the powers of the board of audit over claims referred to in the original act of June 20, 1874, has any materiality whatever. The repeal of the act of June 20, 1874, which created the board of audit, of course put them out of official existence.

But my objection to the previous report of the committee was substantially that, whereas the Senate of the United States, after a debate and clear consideration and understanding of the subject, had resolved to put an end to the powers of this board of audit, which had been so loosely used, not to say abused, as to create this staggering amount of indebtedness for alleged claims of work and labor which apparently were unfounded—I mean by "unfounded" that the work and labor and the materials had really not been furnished by the parties who were to receive the Government moneys for them; I say

"apparently," because that is what appeared on the face of the re-turns of the board of audit, or of the commissioners who were supervising the actions of the board of audit, in the returns made to the present session of Congress-the creation of the commission and the creation of the board of audit were intended as remedial measures for the extravagance of the board of public works which had preceded them. Experience has shown us that from one cause or another and I do not design to suggest offensive causes - so far from being remedial, it has not checked outlay or extravagance, but, on the contrary, seems to have intensified it. was the intention of the Senate? trary, seems to have intensified it. In the face of these facts, what was the intention of the Senate? To repeal laws which, either by just construction or by misconstruction, could permit such powers to be exercised by either the board of audit or the commission, or both; and so the Senate, to make this thing impossible, by incorporating fit language, adopted after proper debate and discussion, abolished the board of audit and said that they should turn over all their books, papers, and property to the commissioners of the District of Columbia. There was a plain, simple, effective stoppage of an alleged abuse.

Now, why is it that that abolition, deliberately agreed upon by the Senate, should be abandoned by our committee of conference? The fact that they included the repeal of this little act of December, 1874, extending for rinety days the powers of the board of audit, is a very immaterial affair. It does not add in the least to the value of this report, nor does it incline me in the least to vote for it. I ask the Senate, if they wish to have the substantial reform intended by the action of the Senate placed upon the affairs of this District, to insist that the features they voted on shall remain in the bill as reported by the committee of conference. Two things there were: the absolute repeal of all power of the board of audit to run this District and the people of this country one dollar further into debt; and not only that, but that this country one dollar further into debt; and not only that, but that the date of the 27th of January, 1876, should be the boundary in time as to which bonds of the District guaranteed by the United States should be issued for District expenditures. Those two facts stood before the Senate for their consideration. Those two facts were deliberately voted upon time and again by the Senate; and if there were two features in regard to the government of this District which were understood by the Senate to be settled by their votes they were first understood by the Senate to be settled by their votes, they were, first, understood by the Senate to be settled by their votes, they were, first, that the board of audit should be stripped of its powers, and next that the debt should not be greater than it was on the 27th day of Jannary, 1876. If the Senate now choose to retire from their action and reverse their decision they can do so, but by adopting the present report they will have done both. That fact I simply wish understood, because the explanation of my honorable friend from Maine does not in the least degree detract from the force of what I have said. This throwing in a small tub to eatch a whale, this throwing in the repeal of the act of December 1874 extending for pinety days that time within of the act of December, 1874, extending for ninety days the time within which certificates should be considered by the board of audit, is simply nothing at all. It was in fact considered in the former action of the Senate

Two facts remain for the Senate to consider; whether they will, after the exhibition we have had in the Senate, the examination of the reports, the arguments of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and others on the floor, continue for one day or one hour the powers of a board of audit who have permitted, or who have committed, what of a board of audit who have permitted, or who have committed, what appear to be gross abuses, and whether they will also permit this debt to be enlarged beyond what it was on the 27th day of January, 1876. The difference, I may state to the Senate, is this: Up to the 27th day of January, 1876, 3.65 bonds of this District, guaranteed by the Government of the United States to be paid out of its Treasury, had been issued to the amount of $13,777,000, and something over. The bill, in one sense, limited the amount of the debt to $15,000,000. The amendment adopted by the Senate in the face of that restricted it still further to the amount that might have been, or was, and which could be, correctly ascertained on the 27th day of January. There is, speaking in round numbers, about a million and a quarter of dollars between the amount that the committee's report proposes to permit of these 3.65 bonds and the amount which was absolutely issued on the 27th day of January.

No question of public faith in paying the interest on bonds, as it has been referred to by the honorable Senator from Ohio, exists in regard to bonds not yet out; and I say, according to my judgment of what is right, that it was the opinion of the Senate that that debt should not be increased beyond what it was at that day; that at least we should pause there. I understood that that expression was decisive and certain on the part of this body. Now, however, if they choose to adopt the present conference report, I say that, in my opinion, they will have reversed their decision and they will have agreed that whatever may be the amount that may be issued, the interest shall be paid without any regard to the development this debate has made as to the system of this board of audit in paying moneys apparently not due.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say one word. My honorable friend began by saying that we had not done what he had reason to expect we would do, and winds up in the same way. Precisely what he says we have not done, I insist upon it we have done; and if six men are capable of comprehending that, we six men are all agreed that we have done precisely what he says we have not done. This is a most fruitful source of debate. I trust the Senate will go on for the balance of this week, and ventilate this matter thoroughly. There must be something in it new, and novel, and striking, and wonderfully interesting! I have a great mind to enlarge upon it myself, and discuss some of the features that yet have not been brought to light—disclose the beauties and glories that lie about it in many ways! We do not know when we shall ever get such a subject again before the Senate, and let us make the most of it! If there is any shade of it that has not been discussed to every body's satisfaction, I hope on this occasion, before we pass a vote, the Senate will deliver itself on this subject. I wish for all the honorable Senators on this floor who have not had the experience, that they had the experience of the Committee on Appropriations, to force them to bring in these bills, and to consider them, and then feel at perfect liberty to puncture them and their bills at all points, never being able to come to a conclusion upon any subject that involves an appropriation, and nobody content when the last stage of the proceedings has been reached, that of a conference committee, but everbody jealous, everybody suspicious, everybody treating the committee just as if they were in a conspiracy against the Senate of the United States not to do precisely the things they were instructed to do.

If there ever was a report of a conference committee that did con-If there ever was a report of a conference committee that did conform to the judgment of the body, this is that particular report which we have here to-day; and yet my honorable friend stands here and argues that he is greatly disappointed, greatly dissatisfied at the result. What is his trouble about it? He would have the board of audit repealed. It is repealed if you pass this bill; else I do not understand the force of language. My honorable friend from Vermont formerly suggested that there might be a doubt about that, because it did not include the two subsequent acts to that of June, 1874. We have now included the two subsequent acts and that provision which my honorable friend says was in it to continue the board of audit until they had accomplished certain other things, namely, until they had audited two classes of claims, is stricken out, so that the repeal takes effect when this bill is passed, and all the functions which enabled them at any time to increase the debt of this District one cent are gone forever.

Mr. BAYARD. May I read just one line from the report?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; I would be delighted to hear it read once more.

Mr. BAYARD. I am reading now from the report the Senator asks

But this proviso shall not prohibit the audit and issue of certificates for claims or work and labor already performed and materials furnished.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, he is reading from the wrong report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is good reading; no matter. My honorable friend was not in when I stated the case, and I did restate it to him again. To go over the whole ground again would not be a delight to me, but it might amuse the country. If my honorable friend had given attention to my statement, it seems to me he could not have misunderstood that that is all out, so that, I repeat, the function of this board to do anything in the way of anditing dies when this bill becomes a law. That is what we did; to gratify my honorable friend, among others, we struck out all the authority to audit entirely.

Mr. BAYARD. The difficulty is that the last report of the committee has not been printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The difficulty is not that it has not been printed. What on earth is there to print? I would like to know now if anybody can be made to believe that the Senate of the United States cannot understand what I say, when this report shows on its face at a glance that only two alterations have been made; one to make it certain that the functions of this board of audit stop now absolutely, with no power to audit any claim whatever. That is one change; and the other change is simply to make it certain. That is done by refor other change is simply to make it certain. That is done by referring to all the statutes enacted upon the subject. That is all there is, and is there any necessity of printing a report of that description?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Maine is usually so considerate and consistent in all he does in this Chamber that it seems impossible to suppose that he would find fault with any member of the body for endeavoring in a very simple, straightforward manner to perform his duty in regard to the public service. My interest in the bonds of this District, my interest in the affairs of this District, is nothing more than belongs to any other member of the Senate. The people of this District have no representative upon the floor of either House of Con-They are relegated entirely to the exclusive control of Con-Their affairs are not committed to me especially, for I am not gress. a member of either committee appropriately charged with the cona member of either committee appropriately charged with the consideration of this bill; but the facts relating to their affairs were brought to my knowledge, and when they were I should have been very reckless to my sense of duty if I had not taken the interest I have in seeing that the measures relating to them were in proper have in seeing that the measures relating to them were in proper shape. I may be very unintelligible, I may not be able to comprehend a report which was scarcely read to me and which is not before the Senate in a condition to be read. When I asked the honorable Senator from Maine in what features his present report differed from that which the Senate recommitted to him, he stated but one, and that was that they had included in their present report the repeal of the set of December 1874. That set I thought was very impractacid. The act of December, 1874. That act I thought was very immaterial. The great point with me was whether the power of this board of audit did exist to increase the debt of the District either by certificates or otherwise over the amount it was on the 27th day of January, 1876.

That is the point, and that I think important. The difference between the amount of the bonds of the District guaranteed by the Government of the United States on the 27th day of January, 1876, and the amount now prescribed by this committee's limit is about a million and a quarter of dollars; and I do not propose that bonds shall be issued for that extra amount until some other means of inquiry into the rightfulness of the claims have been instituted by Congress than the present machinery under which the auditors or their officers are acting. That is all. I regret exceedingly that my objection should entail any labor upon this committee of conference; but it is my duty, and it being my duty I certainly shall perform it as well as I may, to see that a system which has resulted in such a gross, disproportionate, and cruel expenditure of public moneys should be brought to an end as soon as possible.

I again state to the Senate that I think the adoption of the present report will destroy the power of the Senate to arrest the further issue of the 3.65 bonds to the amount of the difference between thirteen million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars and $15,000,000. If they choose in the face of that to accept the report, be it with them, but it shall be done with my vote recorded against it.

Mr. SARGENT. The objection made distinctly by the Senator to the former report of the committee of conference was that it continued the board of audit until it should have audited accounts and issued certificates up to the amount of $15,000,000. It was objected by Senators, and the vote of the Senate subsequently emphasized the idea, that the board of audit should be abolished at once and that these accounts should not be passed into certificates or into bonds. The bill was sent back to the committee with this apparent instruction of the Senate. The committee met again, and they acceded to that view of the Senate as necessarily they must, and what they have reported I will read in order that the Senate may see that every word is used that is possible in order to destroy the board of audit. After this joint resolution shall have passed and been signed by the President not a vestige of power will be left in the board and no existence to the board itself.

That the said commissioners-

This relates to the District commissioners-are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind, the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

That stops them from incurring any further indebtedness, provided the board of audit were continued.

And provided further. That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia, "approved December 21, 1874, and of the "act to extend the time within which the board of audit of the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board," approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

That is first, second, and third. The original act and the two amendments are absolutely repealed.

And all compensation allowed to said board of audit for their services under the provisions of said act of June 20, 1874, and the acts amendatory thereof, shall cease. And after the expiration of thirty days from the approval of this joint resolution all books, papers, and records of the said board of audit shall be turned over to the commissioners of the District of Columbia or their successors in office.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from California has the report before him, will he be kind enough to read that portion of it which puts an end to the power to issue any more bonds?

Mr. SARGENT. That belongs to the board of funding commissioners, which is provided for in the original act. It is quite another act. The funding commissioners are those who have that power.

Mr. DAWES. But there is some provision there relating to the

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has been suggested to me to have the bill read from the desk as it will stand if the report be agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I know how difficult it is to understand the report of a committee of conference; it necessarily is. It seems to me that there is no question about the abolition of the board of audit; but I would like to hear, if the Senator from Maine has the report, that provision read in reference to the power to issue any more 3.65 bonds. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That stands precisely as it came from both Houses; they have no power.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware it does; but, if the Senator has the report there, I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SARGENT. I will read it:

That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see any difficulty in that. Mr. BAYARD. And there is to be no increase of the debt?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator desires to have the bill read as it will stand if the report be agreed to, I will have it read at

Mr. DAWES. The point upon which I took issue seems to be perfeetly clear.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill will read as follows, if the report is

Resolved, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District, issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the sum necessary to pay the same from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools: Provided. That any further issue of 3.65 bonds, under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the said commissioners are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia, approved December 21, 1874, and of the act to extend the time within which the board of audit of the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board, approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and all compensation allowed to said board of audit for their services under the provisions of said act of June 20, 1874, and the acts amendatory thereof, shall cease. And after the expiration of thirty days from the approval of this joint resolution, all books, papers, and records of the said board of audit shall be turned over to the commissioners of the District of Columbia or their successors in office.

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall be deemed

The committee of conference endeavored to carry out the instructions of the Senate. The point seemed to be on the total annihilation of the board of audit, and I do not know how we could possibly have used language more effectual to that end than that which we have employed. That was our purpose, and I think we have succeeded.

Mr. EATQN rose.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me a moment I wish to make one other remark, which is all I care to submit.

There was one other proposition discussed in the Senate, but there was no vote of the Senate upon it, or rather no such expression as amounted to an instruction. Of course, an instruction to a committee of conference is an anomaly, an impossibility, because it must be a full and free conference to be any conference at all. If instructed, the committee on the part of the Senate would not be on equal terms with the committee on the part of the other body, and we can only observe the spirit of the body we represent and carry out their wishes so far as we can. There was one other proposition, the amendment incorporated in the original bill by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Eaton,] which was, that no bonds issued after the 27th day of January would be recognized by the United States, or words to that effect. That amendment was adopted under certain information which the Senator gave to the Senate which subsequently proved in some particulars to be a mistake. For instance, he was informed, and as he supposed credibly, that the board of funding commissioners had passed a resolution upon the appearance of this original legislation in the House that they would not issue any further bonds, but that within a week thereafter and without the knowledge of some members of the board, in violation of their own resolution, they did proceed to issue $150,000 worth of those bonds, or somewhere about that amount. The circumstance seemed suspicious that they should violate their own resolution, not that they were compelled to adopt any such resolution, or that perhaps they had not a legal right to disregard their resolution; yet it seemed a suspicious circumstance. Under this statement the Senate adopted an amendment of the same date as that named in their resolution, namely, the 27th day of Janu-It subsequently seemed, however, on the statement of Moses Kelly, the treasurer of the board, who, I will inform my friend, is a most excellent democrat, as is every one of the board of funding commissioners, that they did pass a resolution a copy of which I had read in the presence of the Senate. That resolution itself said they would not issue any bonds on any certificates which should thereafter be filed, but that they would upon certain applications which were pending before them and which were in process of being funded into bonds, amounting to between two and three hundred thousand dollars; that that work should be completed and everything else should be suspended; and this was done in a full meeting of the board; and subsequently, a week later, the action was re-affirmed; and they never did act inconsistently with the resolution so enacted. This removed any suspicion of unfair dealing on the part of these gentlemen, and there was nothing to mark the 27th day of January except the passage of a resolution which in itself did not re-Sandary except the passage of a resolution which in itself did not require that bonds should stop at that time, but simply that the receiving of further certificates should stop. Since that time they have received no further certificates. Now, there being some of us in the Senate who thought that that could be fixed in the committee of conference, the amendment was put on the bill, and as my friend from West Virginia said the other day, these facts appearing in the conference the amendment went. I remember the Senator from Connecticut did call attention to the omission of this amendment by the conference committee when the first report came in, but the chairman of the committee at that time informed him that it was considered that this was not the sense of the Senate; and that is our opinion at the present time, that there was nothing in the bonds issued since the 27th of January in accordance with that resolution which should invaliany more than bonds issued before that time, because date them many of those bonds are upon certificates that are a year old, that were among the first acts of the board of audit, the parties not having chosen before this late time to have them converted into bonds. and we saw no reason why they should be punished for that act or why

That this was the sense of the Senate I am thoroughly convinced. and so far as we did understand the sense of the Senate we tried to carry it out, especially as there was some criticism before that we had not been sufficiently careful in the matter. I can sympathize strongly with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his remarks upon the difficulties which assail the chairman of that committee, and I must say that it reaches to the whole committee in the progress of measures of appropriation like these in the Senate. We are assailed on all hands on account of bills which we do our best to perfect, bills containing perhaps a thousand items, as the sundry civil bill, each one requiring special attention and special study on the part of the committee; and when a bill like that is sent to a committee of conference and action is taken upon it which disagrees with the Senate, for there would be no committees of conference if there were not conflicting views between the two Houses, there must be a large discretion left to such a committee. All we can ask in such cases is that the members of a committee so acting shall at least be believed by brother Senators to act conscientiously, if they do not always act wisely.

Mr. EATON. I agree with the distinguished Senator from California that instructions to a conference committee are wrong in every way; but because it would be wrong to instruct a conference committee it by no means follows that their report should be accepted when it is presented to the Senate. Now, I have only one word to say before I make a motion which it was my purpose to make in rising, and that is with regard to the amendment which seems to have so troubled the conference committee. That amendment, which I had the honor to introduce, was drawn, as I told the Senate, after I received information with regard to the resolution that passed the board of sinking-fund commissioners. It was drawn and submitted for the reason that after action had been taken by the House of Representatives I received positive information that this board was issuing new bonds. That is the truth. They issued between one and two hundred thousand dollars of bonds after the commencement of the legislation in the House of Representatives, and therefore it was that I drew the amendment for the purpose of stopping all payments upon those bonds. If I could have had my entire way in this matter I would not have paid the interest on one dollar of this $13,700,000 of bonds until there had been a full and thorough investigation. As I rose for the purpose of making a motion I will make it now. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, and others. O, no!
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 14,

Mr.DAVIS. In regard to printing the report, I agree with my friend from Tennessee, and certainly there will be no objection to that being done on my part. I want the Senate to know fully what the report of the committee of conference is. I will state very briefly what I understand it to be.

There were on the 1st of February, according to the report of the commissioners, $13,724,900 in 3.65 bonds issued. I understand that this is the amount now; that there have been none issued since that Mr. EATON. You are mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. My friend from Connecticut says I am mistaken. I shall be glad to be corrected if I am.
Mr. EATON. After the joint resolution was introduced into the House of Representatives there were between one and two hundred thousand dollars of these bonds issued.
Mr. DAVIS. I understood my friend to say that there were now over

Mr. DAVIS. I understood my friend to say that there were now over fourteen millions, or about fourteen millions, instead of $13,724,000 of

Mr. EATON. I did not say anything about $14,000,000 of bonds, because I did not know anything about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I trust my friend from West Virginia will answer fully all questions, but I suggest that the report be adopted and printed, so that gentlemen can read it at their leisure. [Laughter.

Mr. DAVIS. There appears to be a question of fact in this matter. On the 1st of February the commissioners report $13,724,900 in 3.65 bonds. Now I understand my friend from Connecticut, while he does not explain the amount, to say that that was increased by one or two hundred thousand dollars since that time. Am I correct in my supposition?

Mr. EATON. I have said nothing of that kind. What I said was that after the Congress of the United States had commenced legislation on this subject by the introduction of a resolution the board of audit wrongfully, absolutely wrongfully, I trust not criminally but wrongfully, issued between one and two hundred thousand dollars in bonds. I do not understand the Senator from West Virginia to deny it either. That is my assertion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. As I understand it, the board of audit never issued a bond at all. The bonds were issued by the funding commissioners, a separate and distinct body of men.

Mr. STEVENSON. They issued the certificates upon which these bonds did issue, and if these bonds are held to be invalid in view of the fraud, the United States is not bound to pay them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg to correct my friend from Kentucky. The bonds were issued upon the official statement of the commissioners that these amounts were due.

Mr. STEVENSON. If these bonds were issued upon debts that the United States were not bound for, and if the commissioners had not the right to issue them, I deny, even upon the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, my friend from Ohio, that the United States is bound. One of the great things that we have desired is to see if we could find out what bonds were valid and what were invalid before we undertook to pay any of them.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not understood from any gentleman yet that there was an increase of the amount named by myself, either by the board of audit or by the commissioners. I know not but what they issued a million. My friend from Connecticut has said they issued one or two hundred thousand dollars between the time that the House of Representatives began the consideration of the resolution and the 1st of February. I am not here to defend the board of audit. My opinion of them is very much that which has been expressed by other gentlemen. I do not mean to defend the board of audit or the commissioners. I think they were very extravagant and increased the debt out of all reason. I believe they ought to have been stopped long ago; but that is not the question before us now. The question before us is whether we shall adopt a conference committee's report which abolishes the board at once, which gives them no further power to issue or audit any amount. As I understand this report, it gives them no further power to issue a bond, to audit a claim, or to issue a certificate. What has been done heretofore is another question.

Mr. WITHERS. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a ques-

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.
Mr. WITHERS. I wish the Senator would explain why it is that the period of thirty days is fixed as the time at which they are to cease their issue.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a very proper question. As I have stated their functions as a board for the purpose of examining or auditing or issuing anything whatever cease upon the passage of the bill. Now they are continued in office thirty days, as is understood generally and as was stated by members of the conference on the part of the House, because there is an investigation going on for the purpose of seeing whether these bonds and certificates have been properly or im-properly issued and whether they are due. For that purpose, and for that purpose alone, in order to let these gentlemen answer certain questions which have already been sent to them in the shape of interrogatories, the conference committee representing the other end of the Capitol wished them to remain for thirty days in order to allow the investigation already commenced, and probably well advanced, to continue. Then their power will cease altogether and they are to hand over their books. It was stated by the chairman of the committee of investigation in the other end of the Capitol that it would seriously trouble them as a committee of investigation into the affairs of the District of Columbia if the board were at once abolished.

Mr. EATON. I see the Senator from West Virginia has given the reason which governed the committee of conference. I beg leave to say it astonishes me. It is the first time I have ever learned that you could get any information from a board by leaving them in office any better than you could by taking their books and papers away from them and not leaving them for thirty days the entire control of their them and not leaving them for thirty days the entire control of their books and papers.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from West Virginia did not quite say that was the only reason. That was one of the reasons. Again, does the Senator from Connecticut think it is quite a fair thing in the middle of an investigation into the official acts of anybody or any corporation to cut off and abolish the office just at that point and not give them a fair experiments of the part of the and of the second of the s corporation to cut off and abolish the office just at that point and not give them a fair opportunity of being heard to the end?

Mr. EATON. If the Senator addresses his inquiry to me he has got two questions mixed up. He asks me, first, do you think it right to abolish the board? I say yes. He then asks me whether I think they ought not to have a fair chance to show their reasons. I say yes. But do not put two question together and ask me to answer them both.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought my friend was fully competent to answer any number of questions and that it was just as well to put them to him at once. It is suggested by my friend from North Carolina near him at once. It is suggested by my friend from North Carolina near me [Mr. Merrimon] that the people of the section of country from which my friend from Connecticut comes are in the habit of asking questions and not answering them. [Laughter.] My disposition during the entire debate, during the investigation, and during the conference committee has been to try to act fairly and to carry out the wishes of the Senate. I believe when we abolish the board without giving them any power whatever to do anything, but still holding them for the purpose of investigation, that we are carrying out just the wishes of the Senate as expressed more than once.

As to the amount of bonds, so frequently referred to, so far as the committee of conference can stop the issuing of bonds or certificates or the auditing of accounts they have stopped them. All that will be stopped immediately upon the passage of this bill. I understand further that there has been no auditing nor any issuing of bonds or certificates since the first day of February. That I am not well informed of, but I believe it to be the fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt the committee of conference have done what they thought it was proper to do. I have no fault to find with the committee of conference. I voted for the original proposition to abolish the board of audit, but in doing so I was not governed by any consideration that the board of audit had acted in any manner corruptly. I have the pleasure of an acquaintance with the First Comptroller, and, though differing with him entirely in politics, I believe he is a gentleman of high character. I voted for the abolition because I believed the board of audit had made mistakes which had resulted in the issuing of certificates and bonds for which the Government of the United States is liable which ought not to have been issued. The only fault that I have to find with the committee of conference (and in differing with them in that respect I do not attribute to them anything wrong) is that we did by a solemn vote declare in the Senate originally that interest on the bonds issued after January 27 should not be provided for, and the committee of conference have not regarded that as an instruction, but in the report have omitted any provision upon that point. I have said before that the board of audit made mistakes and that bonds had been issued, in my opinion, and the made mistakes and that bonds had been issued, it my opinion, and delivered which ought not to be paid. I should have preferred if the committee of conference had reflected the judgment of the Senate upon that particular point and, at the instance of the Senator from Connecticut, had made provision that no bonds issued after January 27 should be regarded. I would prefer therefore that this report be printed before the final action of the Senate upon it. For that reason I shall vote for the motion to print the report rather than adopt it now and have it printed afterward.

port be printed.
Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, this report may have been read and explained sufficiently for the comprehension of other Senators in this Chamber; but I must confess that I do not quite understand it so as to feel at liberty to vote upon it. I hope that the motion to print will prevail. If experience has any lessons for any legislative body in this world, the experience of this Senate and of Congress with the gentlemen who have ruled in this District should teach us and teach everybody, that anything which passes this Chamber and which passes the other House is to be studied, not with a view to what its plain meaning and common acceptation would be with common men and with courts or with legislators, but what forced and unnatural and unreasonable interpretation may be put upon that language by men who are bound to get around any enactment we make to restrain them in what they choose to do. In view of the construction which the board of public works and the board of audit and the commissioners and other people have put upon the laws which Congress has passed in reference to this District, in view of the superhuman ingenuity that has been displayed to get around every provision calculated to restrain them, I do hope that gentlemen upon this floor will not resist the printing of the report of this conference committee, so that we may know exactly what we vote upon, and so that what we vote upon may be studied with a view to see what interpretations interested parties may hereafter put upon it. It seems to me that the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, that, on account of to-morrow being a legal holiday, we should pass this bill now with-out such opportunity to see and to study it as we desire, have not much force.

Mr. President, if this Senate and if the other branch of Congress had bestowed more care upon the bills which they have passed in reference to this District, the party to which I belong, and the country, and the people of this country would have saved themselves a great deal of loss and a great deal of trouble; and I do hope that now there will not be an attempt to pass this bill without printing it, so that we can see and study it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say just one word in reply to my honorable friend from New Hampshire and in confirmation of what the Senator from Ohio said. After so long a time spent to-day, and after the subject-matter has been so thoroughly considered as it has been heretofore, and after we knew so definitely what we wanted on the former report and now know that only two changes have been made in it, and as it seems to me there cannot be any doubt what they are, I do not think we ought to delay for another moment. How much soever we may distrust the Greeks bearing gifts, or how much soever we may deprecate what has been done outside, I scarcely believe that any ghost of that sort ought to frighten us from our pro-priety so as to make us think that we are utterly incapable of putting two and two together and knowing what the result is without its being put in print. Still if a majority of the Senate really feel as my honorable friend from New Hampshire expresses himself, that they do not know what this report is, let it be printed; otherwise I

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have taken a good deal of interest in this legislation and have had occasion to criticise that which has gone before it a great deal. I opposed the conference report that was recommitted; but it does seem to me that if any possible language can be adopted to express the meaning of the Senate, the conference committee have adopted that language in this report. While I sympathize with what has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire as to the past legislation, yet if it be possible to put words together that will convey a definite and positive meaning, it seems to me that has been done in this conference report; and so far as I am concerned, having had a good deal of difficulty in understanding what has been done heretofore, it seems to me that two or three things are accomplished now beyond all peradventure. One is that there can be, when this bill is passed, not another dollar of 3.65 bonds issued. Another is that this board of audit will cease to exist when this conference report is adopted. What more we can accomplish about those matters that have troubled us heretofore I do not understand. I am willing to vote for printing the report if that is insisted on; but I am entirely satisfied with the report. Everything that the Senate sought to carry out it seems to me the committee have now carried out except the provision that was introduced on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] and that is a provision that it does not seem to me possible for us to carry out. We authorized certain persons to issue these bonds. If they have gone beyond their authority, either the United States or innocent parties must suffer. There is no principle of law more plain than that when one of two innocent parties must suffer for another man's fraud, that of the two parties must suffer who has given the opportunity to commit the fraud. That is the United States or the District of Columbia; and it is utterly impossible for us to single out of these thirteen millions of bonds now afloat any of them and say that as to them we will repudiate because those whom we appointed to issue them have gone, in our opinion, beyond their authority. The effect of it would be only to depreciate further all the bonds that are now out, and in the end we should pay those bonds as we pay these. Everything else, it seems to me, has been accomplished in this report; and I rose merely to tender my thanks to this committee for having at last spoken the mind of the Senate so clearly and so definitely that it seems to me the in-genuity which has been so happily described by the Senator from New genuity which has been so happily described by the Senator from New Hampshire will be baffled in these words.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it seems that the Senator from Massachusetts is satisfied, and he appears to suppose that because he is satisfied everybody else should be; but I cannot forget that the Senator from Massachusetts was in the House of Representatives when these other acts were passed. I cannot forget that if, when he supported the acts which were passed, he had given to those acts the attention which I now ask for this we should perhaps have been saved a good deal of this trouble.

Now, as to my friend the Senator from Maine; he assures us that now this matter is all right; but I cannot forget that only the last time when the conference committee made their report before we had from him the same assurance that it was all right then. But it turned out as it now seems that, although the board of audit was intended to be abolished, the committee had overlooked a certain statute; and that, if the report had passed as it was presented before, it would have left the board of audit in existence.

Mr. President, in view of the fact, that notwithstanding my friend the Senator from Massachusetts was in the House, he assented to the passage of bills there which have made us a great deal of trouble; in view of the fact that the Senator from Maine, when he made his report before, omitted to name in the bill a provision of law which should have been in, I must ask for myself at least the opportunity

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word in reply to what my honorable friend from New Hampshire has said. The chairman of the committee did not say before that he thought the report was inadequate in the respect to which he refers. I am of opinion now that it was complete in that respect; that repealing the first act repealed all the subsequent powers of the board; but the committee, anxions to accommodate itself to the criticism of the Senate, did most cheerfully comply and amended it in that particular. I remain of the same opinion I did before. So I think in that particular it was complete before.

My argument was that, whatever criticism the report was open to before, we had concluded it now; and then, as to the second proposition, I think now that it was nothing but honest and fair that we should have allowed this board of audit to carry into certificates all the outstanding claims, but manifestly the other branch, and, I think, this branch of Congress, desired that the whole thing should come to an end. In deference to that judgment of the Senate and House, the committeee have framed this report. That is precisely how it stands. I submit to my honorable friend that it may be an infirmity of judgment; but it is not an inaccuracy of profession on my part as to the

The question being put, there were on a division-ayes 22, noes 25.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Patterson, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Withers—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Key, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Windom, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Burnside, Cameron of Pennsy Ivania, Conkling, Dennis, Dorsey, Gordon, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Thurman, Wallace, West, and Whyte—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COCKRELL, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division-ayes 18,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I submitted a motion to print this report, believing that the Senate would be better prepared to perceive the difference between the present report of the committee of conference and the report heretofore submitted when this one should be printed as the former one was. I was anxious to have it manifest to the Senate that in one important particular the committee of conference had failed to carry out the vote of the Senate in amending the bill as it came from the House. In my opinion that amendment to bill as it came from the House. In my opinion that amendment to which I refer was the most important part of the bill if it was the desire of the Senate to stop the illegal issue of these bonds. *

Mr. President, I should have voted for the payment of interest upon the bonds issued prior to the 27th of January, 1876, because we had invested in certain officers the power to issue them, though I believed that every dollar exceeding $5,000,000 of issue was a fraud upon the act by which the board of audit was permitted to issue bonds at all. But, sir, having invested that power in the board of audit. I would as a legislator have voted to meet the obligation, beandit, I would as a legislator have voted to meet the obligation, because if it had been the case of an individual he could be made to meet it, and as a representative I shall always vote to carry out the obligations of a government which in a court of law an individual would be compelled to carry out. If an individual had invested certically and individual had invested certically an individual had invested certically and individual had inves tain powers in an agent and he exceeded them, the principal could be made to pay the debt; and therefore I should have voted to pay it in this case to that extent. But after we took jurisdiction of the question, after the House of Representatives had put upon its passage and passed a bill by which the world was told "there is something wrong in the issue of these bonds," by which the House of Representatives, the representatives of the people, declared to capitalists and others receiving these bonds "these meu in our opinion have gone others receiving these bonds "these men in our opinion have gone beyond the duties we have imposed upon them," I see no reason why in duty or in honor we should pay bonds issued subsequently; and therefore I favored the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] and which was put upon this bill by the vote of the Senate, and which was in my opinion the important provision of the bill as we passed it, because it saved to the people of this nation a million and a half of dollars illegally issued, fraudulently issued, in my opinion, upon the act which authorized bonds to be issued.

Now, Mr. President, it is insisted by those who sustain the conference report that our committee have carried out the will of the Senate, which they understood to be the abolishment of the board of audit alone. Why abolish the board of audit at all? Why did the Senate agree to the abolishment of the board of audit at all? Why should not the board of audit be continued if they were doing their exact duty and no more? Why abolish it now and not on the 27th of January? Was there not as much reason for abolishing it on the 27th of January as there is for abolishing it now? Would not the same reason apply for refusing to recognize the contracts made in the intereason apply for refusing to recognize the contracts made in the interim? Is not the reason as strong as the reason for their abolishment now? If they have done nothing but their duty, if they will do nothing but their duty, why should you abolish them? The same reason, it strikes me, that would abolish them now because they may do that which is not their duty and that which will bind the United States beyond what the intention was in the passage of the original bill, exists equally strong for stopping them after the time the legislative branch of the Government took jurisdiction of the question, and that was on the 27th of January.

was on the 27th of January.

Why pay bonds issued between the 27th of January and now? It is said because they were upon audited accounts; they were upon accounts already presented and audited. Why stop them until they have audited all the accounts which may be presented under the act? Why cut them off? Every single claim which was presented to the board of audit prior to the 27th of January is as much entitled to an audit and to an issue of a bond as are bonds issued after the 27th of January to recognition; and why do we take the 27th of January? Because upon that day notice was given to the world "there is something wrong in these bonds; these men are going beyond their duty; and you must take notice that we will not pay fraudulent claims, and you must take notice that these are fraudulent." Therefore I say it is our province, as well as our right and our duty to the country, to stop them at that time, if we believe that they are issued contrary to the terms of the act by which the heard was created and upon that I the terms of the act by which the board was created, and upon that I the motion which I have made.

have not the slighest question. It has amazed me utterly that any one reading that act could construe it to mean an increase of the debt of the District of Columbia. Therefore, sir, I shall vote against the report of the committee of conference, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL, (at four o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. And on the motion I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. SARGENT. If the object is to filibuster, I yield. Of course we have no protection, and we may as well adjourn.
The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn. Bayard. Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, English, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Gordon, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Morton, Ransom, Robertson, Thurman, West, and Whyte—18.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question now. I have a great deal of confidence in the gentlemen who have so long occupied distinguished positions in this body; and yet we have seen that in the past they have made mistakes. Now, I think that it is only reasonable and just that the request which we have made that this bill may be printed, and we may have an opportunity of examining it and voting upon it intelligently, should be granted to us. I do not think that this great country of ours will suffer any material injury if this bill is not voted upon until the holiday which we have this day established shall have been observed on the coming morrow. I appeal to the gentlemen who are in charge of this bill to grant us the privilege, the humble privilege, of having it printed, and examining it, that we may vote upon it intelligently. They may be perfectly satisfied; they were satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the correctness of the former conference report which they made to this body; and now some of the distinguished gentlemen admit that that report was incorrect. If that report was incorrect after we had received such assurances of its correctness, have we any guarantee that this also is not incorrect?

This is the point that we make; and I hope the gentlemen will permit this report to be printed, that we may examine and vote upon it mit this report to be printed, that we may examine and vote upon it intelligently. I cannot say really that I am opposed to the bill now, for I have had no time to examine it. I hope it will be printed, so that we may have an opportunity of examining it; and, if that motion is in order, I will now make it, that this bill be printed, and if gentlemen desire to make it the special order for Wednesday morning, I have no objection to that. I have no intention of simply creating allow. That is not the point. I merely want time for examination. delay. That is not the point. I merely want time for examination. Now, if this motion be in order—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the motion to print has been rejected and it is therefore not now

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks a motion to make the bill the special order for Wednesday, another day, would be in

Mr. COCKRELL. I make that motion, that this bill be printed and made the special order for Wednesday at one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion to mr. COCKRELL. That that part of the motion is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.
Mr. COCKRELL. I move that it be made the special order for Wednesday at one o'clock, and in the mean time I hope it will be

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend need hardly move that. It is a privileged question that the Senate can take up at any time. I trust we shall have a vote on the measure at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri insist on his motion?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that this report be made the special order for Wednesday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend really does not desire that, I suppose. This is one of those privileged questions that the Senate will always consider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that this motion will require a two-thirds vote, under the rules.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire, as I stated to gentlemen, that this report shall be printed so that we may have an opportunity of examining it, and I have no intention of simply creating delay by

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion. Mr. WITHERS. I hope my friend from Missouri will withdraw his motion, as it will require a two-thirds vote, which manifestly it cannot command. I have voted with the minority on all these questions. I expect to vote for the report of the committee; but I have thought the printing of the report in order to afford members who were not the printing of the report in order to afford members who were not satisfied on the subject an opportunity of satisfying themselves was a right which they had, and I cast my vote to give them that right. But as it is manifest that a majority of the body is in favor of adopting the report of the committee, I hope my friends will withdraw any further opposition and let the vote be had.

Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will withdraw that motion if gentlemen so prefer. I have no disposition to press it; but I will ask, if this motion be in order, that the bill be engrossed in a plain, legible hand, that we may have an opportunity of reading it before we are forced to vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that that would not be in order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move to postpone the consideration of this question until Wednesday at one o'clock. That only requires a ma-

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the report, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

ABSENT—Messrs. Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Dennis, Dorsey, Gordon, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Morton, Ransom, Robertson, Thurman, West, and Whyte—15.

So the report was concurred in.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move—

Mr. WADLEIGH. I give notice that if after an examination of this bill I find anything in it that I do not approve of I shall move to reconsider the vote adopting the conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let an order be entered to print it, it being adopted.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

Whereas Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of the United States, has for several years been immured in prison under the sentence of a British court; and whereas numerous petitions expressing a strong belief in his innocence and in the injustice of his imprisonment have been signed by the people of this country, and others are in progress of being signed, appealing to Congress to take such steps as may be proper for his relief: Therefore,

*Resolved*, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts and circumstances of Edward O'Meagher Condon's conviction of the offense for which he is now imprisoned; to inquire whether it is a case proper for the interposition of this Government, either in the form of a demand for his release or an appeal to British clemency, and report such recommendation as from the nature and character of the case would in their opinion be proper.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULK-NER] will consent to have his resolution adopted without the preamble, which asserts some facts of which the House may have no knowledge.

Mr. FAULKNER. My proposition is simply that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the preamble asserts certain facts, and then the resolution of inquiry follows. I suggest that the resolution be adopted without the preamble.

Mr. FAULKNER. Why, sir, the preamble asserts nothing more than the fact that this man is imprisoned by sentence of a British

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] object to the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. I do unless the preamble be withdrawn.

Mr. FAULKNER. Well, sir, I will withdraw the preamble rather than have the resolution fail.

Subsequently, Mr. HOAR withdrew his objection to the preamble; when the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. JENKS. No, sir. I ask that the bill which we report, together with the accompanying documents, be ordered to be printed.

POST-ROADS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask that this bill be put on its passage

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the bill contain any general legislation?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. No, sir; it is simply the regular bill establishing post-roads.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRACTICE OF PHARMACY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILLARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1398) to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the District of Columbia, with sundry amendments.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that from and after the passage of the The first section provides that from and after the passage of the act it shall be unlawful for any person, not a registered pharmacist within the meaning of the act, either as owner, proprietor, or partner, to open or conduct any pharmacy or store for the purpose of retailing, compounding, or dispensing medicines or poisons in the District of Columbia, except as thereinafter provided.

The second section provides that it shall be unlawful for the provided of the provided of Any person violating the provisions of the section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100 for each and every such offense.

The third section provides that immediately after the passage of the act, and biennially thereafter, the National College of Pharmacy of the District of Columbia shall nominate ten pharmacists of the District of Columbia, from among whom the board of health of the District of Columbia shall select and appoint five, who shall be known and styled as commissioners of pharmacy for the District of Columbia, who shall serve without compensation, and who shall hold office for two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. for two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. Said commissioners shall, within thirty days after the notification of their appointment, each subscribe to an oath, before a notary public of the District of Columbia, to impartially and faithfully discharge their duties as prescribed by the act. The position of any commissioner who shall fall to so qualify within the time named shall be vacant, and the vacancy or vacancies so occurring, or any vacancy or vacancies that may occur by reason of death or resignation, shall be filled by the said board of health from the number nominated by the National College of Pharmacy.

The fourth section provides that the commissioners of pharmacy shall keep a book of registration open at some convenient place within the city of Washington, of which due notice shall be given through the public press, and shall record therein the name and place of business of every person registered under the act. It shall be the duty of said commissioners of pharmacy to register, without examination, as registered pharmacists, all pharmacists and druggists who are engaged in business in the District of Columbia at the passage of the act as owners or principals of stores or pharmacies for selling at retail, compounding, or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or for compounding and dispensing physicians' prescriptions, and as registered assistant pharmacists all assistant pharmacists engaged in said stores or pharmacies in the District of Columbia at the passage of the act, and who have been engaged in some store or pharmacy where physicians' prescriptions were compounded and dispensed for petent and fully qualified to conduct said business of selling at retail, compounding, or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or to compound and dispense physicians' prescriptions, they shall enter the name of such person or persons as registered pharmacist or registered assistant pharmacist, as the case may be, in the book provided for in section 4 of this act.

The sixth section provides that no person shall be entitled to an examination by said commissioners of pharmacy for registration as pharmacist or assistant pharmacist unless they present satisfactory evidence of being twenty-one years of age and having served not less than four years in a store or pharmacy where physicians' prescriptions were compounded and dispensed.

The money received under the provisions of this section shall be first applied to the payment of such expenses as the commissioners may incur in executing the provisions of this act, and the balance, if any, shall be paid over to the trustees of the National College of Pharmacy of the District of Columbia, for the use and benefit of said college.

Section 10, line 1, after the word "shall" insert the words "procure or."
Section 10, line 6, after the word "dollars" insert the following: "and the name of the person so fraudulently registered shall be stricken from the register."

Mr. WILLARD. This bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee for the District of Columbia. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

uestion on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see that the perpetuation of the board of health is provided for in this bill. Does the gentleman from Michigan think that board of health should be perpetuated in its present form? I hope he will allow me to move to strike out that portion of the bill. It is in the second section, and I will make the motion to strike out if the gentleman will yield me the floor for that purpose.

Mr. WILLARD. The committee did not consider that particular question. They took the government of the District of Columbia as it is. It seemed to them that the board of health was the proper and most competent authority to make selection of the board of commissioners of pharmacy. They are to select these from ten persons who are to be presented to them for that selection by the National College of pharmacy—an institution which is composed of nearly all the prominent druggists of the city. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that in case the board of health should be abolished hereafter some provision of legislation will be made to meet that particular exigency.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is force in that observation, but the distinguished gentleman from Michigan will allow me to say that in my thin legislation is not in harmony with the spirit of our people generally throughout the country. The manifest object of the bill is to create a monopoly in a given branch of industry, to place the whole of a given business under a small number of men, who bethe whole of a given business under a small number of men, who become the leading spirits in guiding and directing this industry. It does not occur to me that any public interest is promoted by it. Private schemes and a tendency to monopoly seem to be the only object of this legislation, thus interfering with the natural business of the people. I am not aware what is the policy in other cities of the country, never having lived in one, but it does not occur to me this measure subserves any good public object. I believe such matters can be better left to the enterprise and intelligence of the people in this and in all other cities.

Mr. WILLARD. Mr. Speaker, the committee are advised, and indeed I suppose there can be but little doubt of the fact, that nearly all the principal cities of the United States have a similar provision. all the principal cities of the United States have a similar provision. It seems to me quite important that communities should have some protection from unskillful and incompetent druggists and pharmacists. There is no hardship imposed upon those now doing business in the city as pharmacists, because they are allowed to register on application to the board of commissioners without examination, but those who engage in the business hereafter are required to submit themselves to examination by the board of commissioners.

I believe this to be in the interest of the highest welfare of the community and that no more private interest should stand in the community, and that no mere private interest should stand in the way of the welfare of the great body of the people.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that it would seem the effect of this will be to "crush out" the smaller establishments, and give advantage to large establishments where heavy capital is concentrated. I believe such matters should be left to the enterprise and intelligence of the people. Let us get rid of close corporations which were so common in the olden time. The practice prevailed, a few years ago, in most of the States of allowing no persons to practice law unless they had gone through some general courses of study in learned institutions. It has been found that, where such professions are thrown open to citizens of good moral character, every public interest is promoted by that policy. I think I shall be compelled to vote against this bill, as one tending to monopoly, to giving large establishments an advantage over those of smaller capital, and as an unnecessary regulation of the industries of the people.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not understand precisely the provisions of this bill, but I would be glad to make an inquiry or two of the gentleman who has it in charge. We all know that there are various schools of medicine, each striving for the mastery both in the public confidence and by legislating in the interest of these several schools. Now, will not the effect of this bill be, or may it not be, at least, that they were contracted to greatly and the gre those who control the granting of licenses may select from some particular school of medicine? Will not this enable them to license only those whom they judge suitable, and will they not judge from their own stand-point: from that of their own school of medicine?

I am very much opposed, as a general rule, to interfering with private enterprise and the private business of citizens. I do not know exactly the purpose of this bill, for I have not had time to examine Certainly I have great confidence in the committee from which it comes; and, as a general rule, it is fair to presume that the committee who have examined a subject are generally right in their rec-

But it does seem to me that in these questions where there are conflicts between different schools of medicine we ought to examine such measures very carefully lest there may be some advantage given to one over another, lest there may be some purpose to secure a monopoly in favor of one class as against others. There are no controversies perhaps that are occasionally so bitter as those which exist between the different schools of medicine. They sometimes become almost as severe as the worst form of persecution that can be gotten up. Now is not this bill open to the charge of permitting favoritism for one school of medicine? I ask for information of the gentleman who has the bill in charge. I hope at least that the House may understand it, so that we shall not be legislating in favor of or in the derstand it, so that we shall not be legislating in favor of or in the interest of any particular class.

Mr. WILLARD. In reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I would say that the committee considered that there was every protection against the evil of which the gentleman speaks in the fact that the board of health of the District of Columbia is organized on those broad principles which would exclude any probability that this board of pharmacy would be directed by any particular class of physicians. The board of health of the District of Columbia itself is composed I believe of physicians of different schools.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What schools?

Mr. WILLARD. It is composed of the orthodox school, if I may so term it, and the homeopathic. But I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee had supposed that in the advancing spirit of liberality in this country no difficulties of this sort would arise. There is a recommendation of this bill which comes from the board of health. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it may be read.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, BOARD OF HEALTH, Washington, January 14, 1876.

The special committee to whom was referred an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the District of Columbia" report that, having carefully examined the proposed measure in conference with prominent druggists of the District, they approve the same, and recommend the co-operation of the board in securing its enactment by Congress.

Report submitted and adopted by the board January 14, 1876.

JOHN M. LANGSTON,

Secretary.

A true copy:

Mr. WILLARD. Mr. Speaker, these two schools of medicine are

Mr. WILLARD. Air. Speaker, these two schools of medicine are represented on that committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What are they?

Mr. WILLARD. The allopathic and the homeopathic.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The eclectic school is not represented. The hydropathic school is not represented.

Mr. KELLEY. The hydropathists do not sell poison.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Then there is another school, a very excellent one, that gives, in the ordinary sense, no medicine at all—the hygienic. I know the secretary of this board of health. He is a lawyer, and I have entire confidence that he would always do right. But if it is left to physicians of any one school I should be afraid that they would not administer justice equally and impartially among differing sects of medical doctrine.

Mr. WILLARD. I would ask the gentleman if he thinks that any other class of men than physicians or druggists or pharmacists would be the proper persons to examine those who submitted themselves as candidates for registration?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not know exactly how that is. The fear is that they would not examine impartially.

I really doubt whether there is any necessity for this bill. I fear that it is an attempt to interfere with private business in a manner which is not required by the public welfare, and it may be productive of mischief.

Mr. WILLARD. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Henkle.]

Mr. Henkle. It was not supposed, Mr. Speaker, by any member of the committee that this bill would occupy the attention of the House five minutes. It is a bill proper and right in all its provisions. The object, and the only object, of it is to protect the lives of the citizens of Washington and the District of Columbia. It is to secure that no one shall have the privilege of compounding and vending medicines except those that are competent to do so. And in order to medicines except those that are competent to do so. And in order to avoid interference with private interest, and to avoid the suspicion or charge that it might create a monopoly, all those now engaged in the drug business in the city of Washington are recognized and continuedunder the provisions of this bill as pharmacists and apothecaries. It provides an impartial board; as impartial as can be provided. A list of ten names is to be selected by the National College of Pharmacy from which the board of health is to select five, and they are to pass upon the competency of those who aspire to go into the drug business hereafter. It does not interfere with the private interests or with the business of any one now in the business; it only proposes to protect the people of the District and of this city for the future.

protect the people of the District and of this city for the future.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] who spoke in reference to this matter suggested that it would be better to throw the doors wide open to competition and let that be the only criterion of success. That might be very well except that the lives of the citizens here are at stake. The ignorant do not know where to go to find a competent pharmacist; such a man might go to an apothecary's shop and instead of getting the harmless medicine prescribed by his physician receive a deadly poison. The people here have a right to expect us to do our duty and to give them protection against ignorant charlatans who attempt to compound medicines that are deadly poisons. There is nothing in the bill that is objectionable in any light; it has There is nothing in the bill that is objectionable in any light; it has been revised carefully and deliberately by the committee; there is nothing in it objectionable to private interests or to the public interests, and I hope the House will pass it for the good of humanity.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman from Maryland now allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HENKLE. Certainly.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Section 3 provides—

That immediately after the passage of this act, and biennially thereafter, the National College of Pharmacy of the District of Columbia shall nominate ten pharmacists of the District of Columbia, from among whom the board of health of the District of Columbia shall select and appoint five, who shall be known and styled as commissioners of pharmacy for the District of Columbia, who shall serve without compensation, and who shall hold office for two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. Said commissioners shall, within thirty days after the notification of their appointment, each subscribe to an oath, before a notary public of the District of Columbia, to impartially and faithfully discharge their duties as prescribed by this act, &c.

Then the board so to be selected will determine who shall be licensed. Now, this bill puts the appointment of all these commissioners under Now, this bill puts the appointment of all these commissioners under the control of the National College of Pharmacy, and the board of health is to select five. Now, why, I ask, why is this?

Mr. HENKLE. Because they are competent to name the men.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Ah! Is not anybody else competent but the National College of Pharmacy?

Mr. HENKLE. If the gentleman from Ohio suggests some other authority competent to more them we will submit authority competent to name them we will submit.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is not that college of pharmacy composed entirely of one school of physicians?

Mr. HENKLE. No, it is not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. How many schools does it represent?

Mr. HENDEE. Everybody who chooses can go into that college.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Is not it an incorporated organization?
Mr. WILLARD. Yes; but it is open to everybody.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, that is a queer kind of school of pharmacy that takes in everybody. I do not seek to disparage it. I have no reason to doubt its learning, its impartiality, its usefulness-I believe it to be a learned and useful body. But what school does it repre-

Mr. HENDEE. Lawyers and ministers, as well as others.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, lawyers would be found useful, for I should have confidence in their judgment. So I would in the ministers and the others.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think lawyers patronize them in their retail business

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think that there should be some additional ower to make these appointments. I submit in all candor that it looks like placing the whole drug business of the District of Columbia within the control of a single close corporation. Now, that ought not to be; it ought to be left so that there shall be an impartial power to select these commissioners and see that every school of medicine shall be fairly represented. With that change I do not know that I should object to this bill.

Mr. HENKLE. It legislates no man out of business who is now in business, and if it proves in a year from this time to be such a dread-ful monopoly we can abolish it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I know that, but it controls all those who shall come into the business hereafter, and what I insist on is that that control should not be given to any one corporation; all interests ought to be represented in it.

Mr. WILLARD. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia were severally agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was put upon the passage of the bill; and on a division there were—yeas 88, nays 8; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLARD and Mr. BRADLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported yeas 105, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The bill was read, as follows:

Be itenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Richard W. Carter, Major A. Nicholson, B. K. Swart, A. P. Fardon, Lewis D. Means, Isaiah Shoemaker, Joseph Weaver, Morris Addler, Jacob H. Kengla, John T. Varnell, James Hoffman, Samuel D. Linn, Philip Brooke, Charles Becker, Josiah Dent, and their associates and assigns, are created a body corporate under the name of the Villa and Suburban Railroad Company, with authority to construct and lay down a single railway track, with the necessary switches and turn-outs, in the city of Georgetown and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, commencing at the corner of High and Bridge streets, Georgetown, along High street to Fourth street, along Fourth street to Fayette street, along Fayette street to High street, and to its intersection with the Georgetown and Rockville turnpike road, and along said road to Tennallytown, with the privilege of extending the said railroad from Tennallytown (along the public road leading to Rockville) as far as the northern boundary line of the District of Columbia. The track shall be laid in the best manner, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be laid on the west side of the turnpike-road leading from Georgetown to Tennallytown, so as not to interfere with the center of said road used by the turnpike company, with the right to run public carriages on the road hereby authorized, drawn by horse-power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding ten cents per passenger for any distance between the termini of said railroad.

SEC. 2. That the said road shall be deemed real estate, and, together with the other real estate and personal property of said company, shall be liable to taxation.

SEC. 3. That the said company shall conform to the grade of the streets and roads in laying rails thereon; and the said company shall keep its track well paved and in good repair. The amendments reported from the committee were as follows: In the first section strike out the words "Villa and Suburban" and insert "Georgetown and Tennallytown;" also in the last sentence of the first section, after the words "interfere with the center," insert "or travel;" also amend the title by striking out "Villa and Suburban" and inserting "Georgetown and Tennallytown."

Mr. HENDEE. I desire to say simply that this bill is reported in answer to an application for a horse-railroad extending from the northwestern part of the city of Georgetown to the village of Tennallytown, a distance of two and one-half miles northwest. That section of the a distance of two and one-half miles northwest. District of Columbia is without any facilities whatever of street-railroad travel. I understand there is no objection on the part of any railroad interest or of any considerable number of people of this District to the passage of the bill. If no one wishes to make an inquiry, I will call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fifth section of this bill, requiring a report yearly to Congress of the affairs and condition of this company. That section requires the report to be signed and sworn to by the president and treasurer of the company, or by a majority of the directors. This annual report of the company is for the security of the public, not merely against buying worthless stock, but also against overcharges, which should not be permitted. My suggestion is that the oath shall be by a majority of the directors as well as by the president and treasurer as is usual in the directors as well as by the president and treasurer, as is usual in a horse-railroad system.

Mr. HENDEE. I have no objection to the amendment, and will move to amend by striking out "or" and inserting "and" before the words "by a majority of the directors."

The amendment moved by Mr. HENDEE and also the amendments reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia were

DISTRICT MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. HARTRIDGE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back without amendment House bill No. 700, to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Sec. 16. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage; but Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the same at any time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] to the fourth section of this bill. That section, as reported, provides:

Sec. 4. That said premium notes shall be payable on demand, and shall each constitute and be a lien to the amount thereof respectively upon the interest and estate, legal and equitable, of the insured in the buildings at risk in said company, and upon the land, premises, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or upon property of any other description insured by said company in consideration thereof. &c.

The effect of that provision would be to make the premium note a lien not merely upon the real estate but upon the personal property of the insured. It seems to me that would give a great opening for raud. I would suggest the propriety of striking out the portion of the section relating to personal property.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. This is to be made a matter of inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. That may be; but everybody who buys a bureau or

Mr. HOAR. I hat may be; but everybody who buys a bureau or wash-stand in an auction-room ought not to be required to look up the record and see if there is a lien upon it for a premium note.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. The objection of the gentleman would be applicable to all mortgages upon personal property, which are allowed by the law. This does no more than a mortgage upon personal property would do; it makes a premium note a lien upon personal property and requires it to be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds where presents may have been seen for information. deeds, where persons may have access for information. I would not deeds, where persons may have access for information. I would not like to consent to strike out that portion of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I believe this proposition is novel in the insurance policy of this country. I am not aware of any instance where a mutual insurance company is allowed to put a perpetual lien upon the personal property which it insures, and which personal property ordinarily passes from hand to hand. It is true that that argument to some extent applies to all mortgages upon personal property. It is also true that the habit of making mortgages upon personal property is one productive of a great deal of fraud, and the community is protected against these frauds only by the most stringent legislation, such as punishing as if for larceny the mortgagors of personal property who undertake to sell the property without giving notice to purchasers of the mortgage upon it. There is no such legislation as that in this bill, and it seems to me it is totally inexpedient to extend this power of acquiring title to personal property unaccompanied by pospower of acquiring title to personal property unaccompanied by possession or by the ordinary evidence of ownership in the way this bill does. I think also it is not necessary, because ordinarily real estate and personal property would be insured together and the mortgage upon the real estate would be sufficient security for the premium note for both. I think therefore this provision should be stricken out.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. The assets of a mutual insurance company consist, in a large degree, of the premium notes. In order to make those premium notes valuable as assets, there must be some security for them. The company to secure those notes takes a lien upon the property insured, whether it be real estate or personal property. The committee think that this is fair and just. Whether such is the general law throughout the country makes no difference. We think it fair and just as giving a proper security to the premium notes. The creation of this lien is the voluntary act of the party insuring. When he gives his premium notes he gives as security a lien upon the property insured; so that he cannot complain. The public cannot complain, because the lien is recorded in a public office to which they have access just as they have to the record of a mortgage upon personal property. I cannot therefore yield to any suggestion to have this pro-

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question ?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Can the gentleman name a single instance in the United States where any insurance company has ever had any such power as this lien upon personal property?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I am not able to name any.

Mr. FRYE. I do not believe there can be found in the whole country a mutual insurance company which has a lien for its premium notes upon furniture, books, stocks of goods, &c., which it may insure. It seems to me the policy is exceedingly dangerous; and that the bill will be just as good for the insurance company with that provision

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to make one further suggestion?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It may be true that this provision is for the benefit of the insurance company, but I desire to guard the innocent purchaser of personal property. In the case of mortgages upon personal property given to secure a debt—ordinarily an absolute, not a contingent indebtedness—there is usually an active and vigilant creditingent indebtedness—there is usually an active and vigilant creditor; and in a great many jurisdictions a mortgage upon personal property is not recognized unless it be accompanied by possession; but where a lien for personal property without possession is allowed it is always accompanied by the most stringent provisions against the sale of the personal property without notice of the mortgage.

This bill, however, goes further and gives for a contingent debt, which may accrue in the remote future, if at all, a lien, and a lien against all purchasers present or future, where the company is not to be expected to watch over and look after the property on which its lien rests. Consequently there will be constant opportunities for personal contractions.

lien rests. Consequently there will be constant opportunities for persons having insurance upon personal property to sell that property in the market, at auction, or at private sale; and thus innocent purchasers may be injured.

Persons who purchase second-hand personal property are ordinarily persons who purchase second-nand personal property are ordinarily persons of humble position in life, easily imposed upon; not knowing the law, not likely to go to a city clerk's office to search and see whether there is any lien upon it. It is for the protection of such persons—women, boarding-house-keepers, people who cannot afford to purchase new furniture—that I desire to see this provision struck out, as it seems to me to give great opportunity for fraud. As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has suggested, I think it will be found that there is no such provision in force in any other jurisdiction within the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There would be no objection to permitting this lien upon chattel property while the property shall remain in the hands of the party insured; but evidently that lien ought not to pursue the property in the hands of a purchaser either at judicial sale or at private sale. I suggest to the gentlemen having the bill in charge that the words be so limited that this lien shall continue only while the chattel property remains in the hands of the party insured; while the chattel property remains in the hands of the party insured; that it shall not continue as against a purchaser either at private sale or at a judicial sale. Unless this limitation be provided this lien would hamper very much the sale of chattel property; and the difficulty is enhanced by the fact that the liability is contingent, and may not arise for a long time. Thus the owner of property would be very much ampered in his right to sell and purchasers would be very much embarrassed in their convertunities to purchase.

very much hampered in his right to sell and purchasers would be very much embarrassed in their opportunities to purchase.

Mr. HENDEE. How would the gentleman provide against a sale in fraud? Suppose the owner undertakes to sell the property for the purpose of defeating the lien.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The law will take care of that. Your equity courts have jurisdiction to set aside sales made to avoid the lien, fraudulent sales, sales in which the buyer unites with the vendor to commit a fraud. A fraudulent sale of that description would be just like any other fraudulent sale. It would be a matter for investigation by the proper court.

like any other fraudulent sale. It would be a matter for investigation by the proper court.

Mr. HENDEE. I have no doubt that the gentleman is correct in his statement of the law. I fully concur with him in his suggestion; and I hope the gentleman who has the bill in charge will consent to an amendment by which the lien shall only operate so long as the property remains in the possession of the party insured.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I think that is right.

Mr. HENDEE. I hope the gentleman will accept such an amendment.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. This being a measure of the committee, I have no power to accept the amendment; but I am perfectly willing it shall be made

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "thereof," in the seventh line of the fourth section, these words:

Provided, That the lien upon personal property shall continue only while the ame remains in the ownership of the person insured.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. HARTRIDGE. As that amendment removes all objection to the bill, I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed an act (H. R. No. 1054) to extend the time for claimants under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress to prove their claims, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment an act (H. R. No. 1802) making appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I desire to have read by the Clerk the following article from the editorial columns of the New York Herald of Saturday last.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Our Philadelphia correspondent has sent us a story which gives us much pain. It seems that Mr. Springer, of Illinois, during the discussion of the bill to appropriate a million and a half to the Centennial, offered an amendment which made this loan a first mortgage or lien upon the revenues of the exhibition. The purpose of the House in passing the amendment was to secure the Government's money. It now turns out that the terms of the amendment were so vague that the Government subscription becomes a second mortgage in fact, and the stockholders will be paid before the Government can receive a dollar. General Hawley called the attention of the Senate committee to this, but the matter was not agitated; the bill passed the Senate, that body having the same impression as the House as to the meaning. In other words, a bill that was passed so as to mean one thing really means another, and, from what our correspondent says, the friends of the Centennial are exulting over the manner in which the Government was fooled.

If this is true then the Centennial stands disgraced by an act of sharp practice; for it is this after all, no matter how we regard it. The fault is of course, with Mr. Springer, who should have known the meaning of words before he attempted to shape legislation. The same thing took place in the Pacific railway times. Then an act was passed which Congress supposed to mean one thing, but which the Supreme Court decided to mean something far different. Instead of bedging the railway, as was intended, the act really presented the road with $200,000,000. This is an evil of our system. It is always possible for an unscrupulous leader to mi-slead Congress. Committees shirk their work, or, as is more likely, they are controlled by the lobby and made to assent to these frauds. We pass these acts and amendments in too much haste. It would be well to have a committee on the "meaning of statutes," whose duty it should be to make clear to Congress what the effect of proposed measures will be. Such tricks as this in the matter of the Centennial appropriation bring discredit upon representative government.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask the Clerk to read from the columns of the Philadelphia Times of the 14th instant the extract which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Ciera read as follows:

The original bill provided that the United States should be paid pro rata with the stockholders, but Mr. Spenkger decided, in his hostility to the measure, to postpone the stockholders until the Government should be repaid in full, and he would have done so, so far as the House could do it, but for the fact that his measure of intelligence was not equal to the measure of his illiberality. It was a battle between stupidity and hate, for the celebration of a century of the achievements of free institutions, and stupidity won. Under the bill as amended by Mr. Spenkger and passed finally, the stockholders will be paid their subscriptions in full first, if there be so much of not revenues, and then the Government must be repaid in full out of any "dividend or percentage of profits" before the stockholders can get interest or profits on their investments.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us see whether the construction put upon the amendment by these papers is the correct one or that which is given to it by the centennial board of finance. I have in my hand a statement of the president of that board, Ex-Governor Bigler, of Pennsylvania, as reported in the New York Times of a recent date. He states that

The managers as such receive no compensation, and they have invested a very large sum of their own money besides; and, although the financial manager, he knew of no instance in which any one had invested capital in the Centennial work with the expectation of getting it back with a profit thereon. But as the bill just passed gives, with the sincere assent of all the managers and stockholders, the profits to the Government, the idea of making money out of the ceremonies has been put to rest.

So it seems that the president of this centennial board, if he has been correctly reported, has given this amendment which the House of Representatives has adopted the construction that only the profits of this institution were to be returned to the United States after all the money subscribed by stockholders had been paid to them.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the proviso as it was passed on that subject for the purpose of showing that the interpretations put upon this bill as amended by this House—and by the adoption of the amendment the House became responsible for it as well as myself—that the construction put upon it by this cen-tennial board is wholly inadmissible.

The proviso as it was passed is as follows:

Provided, That, in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance, after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United United States before any dividend, or percentage of profits, shall be paid to the holders of said stock.

The amendment refers to the tenth section of the bill incorporating the centennial board of finance, and I desire to call the attention of the House to that section. It is as follows:

That as soon as practicable after the said exhibition shall have been closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and after the payment of its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders pro rata in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock.

That is the tenth section to which this proviso refers. The proviso as it was finally passed by this House, relates to the distribution of any money which may be in the treasury of the centennial board after it has converted all its property into cash. And that tenth section of the act of incorporation provided for a pro rata division of the proceeds of the property among the subscribers to the capital stock. But the amendment ingrafted upon the centennial appropriation bill by the House, and which became a part of the law which was re-cently passed, was to the effect that the appropriation made by Con-gress should be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend whatever or percentage of profits should be paid to the holders of the stock of said centennial board of finance. paid to the holders of the stock of said centennial board of finance. Notwithstanding this plain provision, so plain that it does not admit of a doubtful construction, it appears that this centennial board has assumed that this House was guilty of a trick, assumed that we were guilty of a fraud, and were endeavoring to enable the stockholders in this corporation to get back all their money before the Government appropriation should be returned.

The interpretation of the amendment given by the Philadelphia papers is foreign to the legislative intention. When this bill was pending in the House and when this amendment was offered I made ending in the House and when this amendment was offered, I made this statement:

The object of this amendment is to provide that, if there should be a dividend when this exhibition is over, the United States shall come in as a preferred creditor, instead of sharing equally, as this bill now provides, with the stockholders of this corporation. In other words, the United States having made a voluntary contribution, as this bill provides, we shall be first entitled to have the people's money back before any of it goes into the pockets of private individuals as a dividend.

This explanation of the meaning of the amendment was not questioned by any member of the House, although the debate on the bill continued over an hour after it was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole.

But, aside from the legislative intention, by no rules of construction can its meaning be distorted in the manner in which it is attempted to be in the interest of the stockholders of this exhibition. The proviso referred to the "distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance after the payment."

of its debts." When the exhibition is ended, according to the tenth section, it is required that all its property shall be converted into section, it is required that all its property shall be converted into cash, and in the distribution of any moneys in the treasury of the board, after the payment of its debts, the bill as originally drawn provided that, the Government of the United States should share equally with the holders of the stock. But by the amendment it was provided that, before any of it should go to the stockholders, the whole amount of the appropriation made by Congress should be returned into the Treasury of the United States.

Such is the clear, express, and unmistakable meaning of the bill as amended. Any other construction does violence to the letter and spirit of the amendment, and any attempt to force a different consisting the construction of the state of the construction of the state of amended. Any other construction does violence to the letter and spirit of the amendment, and any attempt to force a different construction so as to deprive the United States of the status of a preferred creditor would be dishonorable to all concerned. I cannot believe that a board composed of honorable gentlemen, as I believe the central content of the content of tennial board to be, can for a moment entertain such a construction of the centennial-appropriation bill as amended and passed as it is alleged has been given it by them. If it is the purpose of the board at the end of the exhibition to convert the assets of the corporation into cash, and then return to the stockholders all the moneys they have subscribed

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] rose to a personal explanation. So far as he has any personal explanation to make I have no objection to hearing him. But he is now discussing the probable action of the centennial board of finance and the Centennial Commission.

Mr. KELLEY. When the gentleman from Illinois shall have finished his remarks, I want to make a statement of personal privilege, in which I promise to speak as closely to the question as the gentleman from Illinois is now doing.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have further to say that, if questions of privilege embrace the discussion of all newspaper articles in which the name of a member may be mentioned or in which the action of members may be criticised, we should have nothing but questions of privilege all the session. I do not know that the newspapers or the chairman of the centennial board of finance are authorized to state the legal of the centennial board of manner are accurately import of the amendment in question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] raises the point of order that the gentleman sylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] raises the point of privilege. The rules define a question of privilege thus:

A matter of privilege arising out of any question or from a quarrel between two members or any other cause.

In the enumeration of such questions appears the following: Charges affecting the official character of a member.

Is the gentleman from Illinois speaking to any question that affects his official character?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am speaking to something which I think affects my official character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman is not speaking to something that affects his official character he is out of order.

Several Members. Go on.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would have concluded ere this what I had intended to say if I had not been interrupted. I was saying that if it is the purpose of the heard at the end of the exhibition.

is the purpose of the board at the end of the exhibition—

Mr. HOPKINS. Did I understand the point of order to be overruled, so that the gentleman can go on to discuss the action of the board of finance?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rule that the present tone of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois is not exactly within the definition of a question of privilege.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to inquire if it is not a well-settled rule of this House that when a gentle-quire it it is not a well-settled rule of this House that when a gentleman receives the permission of the House to make a statement he is entitled to speak for an hour on any subject whatever?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say that that seems to have been the usage. The present occupant of the chair thinks that the privilege might be somewhat restrained with benefit to the progress of business in the House; but the Chair is very reluctant to stop the gentleman from Illinois on a point of order.

Mr. CROUNSE. I move that the gentlemen from Illinois may have half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Illinois being allowed to proceed?

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. CROUNSE. The gentleman being limited to half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois went? from Illinois want?

Mr. SPRINGER. I should have finished if I had been allowed to

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I simply desire further to say that, if it is the purpose of the centennial board at the end of the exhibition to convert the assets of the corporation into cash and then return to the stockholders all the moneys they have subscribed before paying into the Treasury of the United States the amount of the appropriation made by Congress, the people have a right to know the fact at once. They will then stamp this whole exhibition as a huge scheme of private speculation and a fraud. Can it be possible that the first century of our existence is to be celebrated under false pretenses, and that the second century is to be ushered in by a legislative job and by corporate peculation and public plunder?

Mr. MUTCHLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the gentleman from Illinois yielded the floor? Mr. SPRINGER.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not yet.
Mr. KELLEY. I thought the gentleman had finished.
Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

MUTCHLER] for a question.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I simply wanted to know whether the money subscribed to the centennial celebration does not constitute one of the liabilities?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not, as against creditors, by any rule of construction that has ever obtained, in winding up the affairs of corporations, so far as I know.

I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a preamble and resolution and ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of that committee as to whether any further legislation is necessary by Congress. If the committee should be of opinion that further legislation is necessary, then this resolution brings the matter before them for their consider-ation. If the committee should be of opinion that no legislation is necessary, then it can so report. I ask that the preamble and resolu-tion be read and referred to that committee.

Mr. CONGER. I take the liberty of objecting. The gentleman from Illinois has made it so perfectly clear what the decision of the courts ought to be on the question that the Committee on the Judiciary cannot possibly give any further information.

Mr. SPRINGER. That might do, if it were a decision of the courts that was to be made. But this is now to be decided by a board, who that was to be made. But this is now to be decided by a board, who have shown some intention to construe this legislation in a manner not in accordance with the law as passed.

Mr. KELLEY. I deny that allegation explicitly and distinctly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the preamble and resolution be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen from Illinois sends to the desk to be read as a part of his remarks a preamble and resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understood the gentleman to ask that the resolution be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is that a question of privilege? that a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.
Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the Chair so to rule.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the preamble and resolution as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] shall get the floor for that purpose, I do not know that I will raise any objection to the reference of his resolution. Nor should I have thought it proper to make the personal explanation touching my own honor which I am about to make, not being at all involved in the matter under discussion, had he not aspersed the character of the gentlemen composing the Centennial Commission and the hoard of gentlemen composing the Centennial Commission and the board of finance, because he in his hot haste to get in an amendment to the bill, so blundered as to give them privileges which they had not asked or expected from Congress. If it be true that the law contains a clause which remits the rights of the Government until all others clause which remits the rights of the Government until all others shall be paid and then refers it to profits for re-imbursement, it was not they who proposed it; it is because the gentleman inserted the proviso against their will and wishes. Their bill contained no such clause. They were ready to accept the bill as it stood, which left this matter unquestionable as to its true construction. The gentleman from Illinois, not satisfied with the aid proposed by the Centennial Committee, said: No, we must do better for you; and inserted his amendment; and now when his generosity is invoking unfavorable comments he says the construction which is attributed to the comments he says the construction which is attributed to the comcomments he says the construction which is attributed to the commission is inadmissible. Were the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] trained to the profession of law and used to studying statutes and the rules of construction, he would think otherwise, at least I infer so, because I know that the late Reverdy Johnson and the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, on their first reading of the bill on the evening that it passed the House, gave it the construction which he says will, if the Supreme Court should chance to sustain it, render the Centennial infamous.

Mr. SPRINGER. I said no such thing, if you will pardon me.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I take it that the bill gives the board legally all the rights expressed by the gentleman's proviso, and that the Supreme Court will decide any question that may arise in accordance with the terms of the act.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the Supreme Court decide it, and I will bow with deference to their decision.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will pardon me for saying so, but I would rather take the opinion of the late Reverdy Johnson and Hon. Jeremiah S. Black than that of any layman in this House, and that is the construction I know each of them, after examining the gentle-man's proviso, separate and apart, gave to it, and which is complained of by the gentleman. The gentleman must be aware from the mere reading of legal reports in the daily journals that all courts hold that the loose conversation and exciting debates that take place on the passage or before the passage of a bill cannot be considered by a court in giving a construction to a law.

It is possible that the gentleman did not mean that his language should convey the privilege that it did. It is possible that he did not know what he was writing or voting for, and therefore the court cannot in constraing his provise consider what he said about it; it must assume that in preparing it he said what he meant, and construe the statute by what it says and the general object intended by the Legislature. It must consider the object proposed, construing provisos by the purpose, the letter, and the context. It must call to its assistance all the guides to the true intent of the Legislature that judicial minds, trained in the study and interpretation of statutes, resort to in giving

Ar. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I have correctly stated the construction which the centennial board of inance places upon my amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know what they hold. I have not conferred with them on the subject, but I do say this, that members of this House who are aggrieved by the insertion of the amendment of the gentleman who did not consider its terms, but were governed by his loose language about it, do know that it is an enlargement of the grant which the bill contemplated, and that it remits the question of the Governments priority to profits.

Mr. SPRINGER. What members of Congress gave it that construction?

Mr. KELLEY. The late Reverdy Johnson and the honorable Jeremiah S. Black.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought you referred to members of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I say they said such was the true construction of the proviso.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would ask was their opinion obtained by the centennial board for their guidance?

Mr. KELLEY. I was about adding, Mr. Speaker, that these opinions were noised abroad, and that the Senate weeks after passed the bill knowing that those two eminent jurists saw that the gentleman from Illinois in aiming at one thing had accomplished another, and in view of these facts I add that it will be a little absurd for this House now to send to the Judiciary Committee a law that it has passed within a month, in order that that committee may tell it what it meant to say and what it did say. There is the whole of the gentle-man's proposition. The committee cannot repeal the bill. The House cannot repeal it. The Senate adopted it by a vote of about twothirds, knowing that the gentleman had enlarged the grant to the centennial board beyond anything that it had requested Congress to do for them; knowing that he had converted a well-guarded loan do for them; knowing that he had converted a well-guarded loan almost into an absolute gratuity, for if the Government has to be paid only out of profits, we must face the fact, which is worth considering, that only one of the world's expositions has paid its way, and that that was the first one; the rest have all been losing concerns to the stockholders, and Pennsylvania and her people, who have paid up $4,500,000 for this centennial celebration of the nation's highlary have put every dellar of it in contemplation of the nation's birthday, have put every dollar of it in contemplation of the probability of loss.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.
Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the House, with the understanding that that amendment admitted of the construction which it is now said is put upon it-that is, that the Government was to be postponed until after the stockholders were refunded the amount of their subscriptions—does the gentleman say that the House, with the knowledge and understanding that that was a fair interpretation of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr.

Interpretation of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Springer.] still passed the bill with that amendment in it?

Mr. KELLEY. I say this: that the House passed the bill with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois in it, and that in case of a deficit it will be for the courts to say what the House meant. I have heard an expression like this: "If the court understands herself, and she thinks she do," [laughter;] and in connection with that judicial expression I say it is fair to presume that this learned, sagacious, coolheaded, deliberative body intended to put every word into that law that it did put there. [Renewed laughter.]

headed, deliberative body intended to put every word into that law that it did put there. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a still further question. At the time that amendment was adopted, was it not the understanding of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] himself, and was not that opinion generally entertained upon this floor, that the effect of the amendment was to make the Government a preferred creditor over the stockholders; that is to say, that the Government was to be repaid the amount of its appropriation before the stockholders were to be refunded the amount of their stock or were to receive any dividend or percentage of the profit? Was not that the understanding of dend or percentage of the profit? Was not that the understanding of the gentleman, and did he not object to the amendment on that ground?

Mr. KELLEY. From what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] said about his amendment, that was my understanding at the time

ER said about his amendment, that was my understanding at the time the amendment was offered and voted on. I had not then read it; but as soon as I had done so I saw what it was, and that the gentleman had been unexpectedly generous.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was read at the Clerk's desk several times. Now is not it the fact that the House passed the bill with that amendment giving it the interpretation which he then gave it?

Mr. KELLEY. Interpreted as it was by the gentleman from Illians.

Mr. KELLEY. Interpreted as it was by the gentleman from Illi-nois I did so understand it. But when it came to be interpreted by Hon. Jeremiah S. Black and the late Reverdy Johnson I did not so understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman what was his interpretation of the amendment? He heard it read.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, I heard it read. But I am like the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Springer,] only a layman. I have been out of the profession for fifteen years; and now if I have a suit about a dog the profession for fifteen years; and now if I have a suit about a dog I go to my lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Then the meaning of all this is that you have the money and you intend to keep it.
Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say—
Mr. KELLEY. I cannot tell what you understand; but I know pretty well what I am saying.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?
Mr. KELLEY. Yes, for a question.
Mr. SPRINGER. 1 desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the interpretation which he has given to this amendment.

whether the interpretation which he has given to this amendment, and which he says was given to it by Hon. Jeremiah S. Black and the late Reverdy Johnson, is the interpretation which the centennial board of finance have also given to it?

Mr. KELLEY. I have had no conference with any member of the centennial board of finance in reference to the matter. I know this, however; they have excellent lawyers to advise them, and the construction which they will give to it will probably be that which, if it comes to litigation, will be sustained by the courts which will pass upon the questions raised. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. KELLEY. A question, certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. What I wish to state is this—

Mr. KELLEY. I want the question.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the gentleman will not object to what I have to say. When the amendment was passed one of the centennial however; they have excellent lawyers to advise them, and the con-have to say. When the amendment was passed one of the centennial commissioners came to me, as one of the friends of the bill, and asked what interpretation the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] put upon his amendment. I went to the gentleman from Illinois and asked what his interpretation was. I make this statement as a friend of the bill and because I have heard aspersions whispered around that the whole thing was a job ab initio. The commissioner came here and was willing to get the interpretation at once. He asked for an interpreta-tion; he did not intend that any charge should afterward be made against them; but he wished the gentleman from Illinois to give the interpretation directly and at once. If afterward any lawyers have said that another interpretation could be put upon it, is it proper that aspersions should be made here on that account? We knew that the interpretation was suggested at the very first, as soon as the bill was passed. The friends of the amendment knew it, and wished it discussed. And the gentleman from Illinois remarked then and there that if necessary he would bring in a supplementary bill. Is not that so?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is.
Mr. HARRISON. The commissioner to whom I refer was General

Hawley. He knew that that interpretation might be put upon it.

Mr. KELLEY. As the ugly word "job" has been used in this connection, I desire to say that the workman who performed the "job" was my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Springer.] It was his handiwork. It was he who put in that plank, as we say about platforms. This amendment is in language that may be subject to judicial interpretation. It is his own work. It was not presented to the House by any member of the select committee on the centennial celebration, or suggested by any member of the Centennial Commission or board of finance.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Centennial Committee knew nothing about it.

Mr. KELLEY. The Centennial Committee knew nothing about it; the Committee on Appropriations knew nothing about it. It was exclusively the "job" of the gentleman from Springfield, [Mr. Springer,] and, if "job" it was, it seems to have been pretty well done, for it would be somewhat difficult to coax the Senate to repeal a bill which was so long before it and so thoroughly considered, or to prevent the President, who has twice recommended the measure, from vetoing any-bill that might propose its repeal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having vindicated my honor and consumed the hour, I thank the House for having permitted me to make this personal explanation which in nowise related to me. I ask leave to re-

Mr. SPRINGER rose.
Several Members. Regular order.
Mr. SPRINGER. I rise for the purpose of moving that the rules be suspended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is business of the Committee for the District of Columbia, but that has been disposed of. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON.]

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MORRISON. To-morrow being the 22d of February, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN ?]
Mr. MORRISON. No, sir.
Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] calls for the regular order.
Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I was recognized by the Chair, and I desire to submit a postion.

sire to submit a motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison] was on the floor; and when the Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana he supposed the gentleman from Illinois was yielding.

Mr. MORRISON. I have not yielded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes a motion.

Mr. MORRISON. That the House adjourn.
Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my point of order. I do not know that any gentleman is entitled to arrogate the right to control the action of this House. I was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from Illinois had yielded to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not ask him to yield. The Chair recognized me and I had a right to make my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose did the gentleman

Mr. HOLMAN. To submit a motion to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MORRISON. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the question is taken on adjournment, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain requests for leave of absence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I still insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of

Mr. HOLMAN. My point is this: I was recognized by the Chair; as soon as I was recognized the gentleman from Illinois made his motion that the House now adjourn. But having the floor, I was entitled at least to submit my proposition. I do not claim that I was entitled to do beyond that point. As soon as I had submitted my proposition I would of course have been off the floor, and the gentleman from Illinois would have then had the right to make his motion; man from Illinois would have then had the right to make his motion; but the gentleman had not the floor for that purpose until I had submitted my proposition under the recognition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he recognized the gentleman from Illinois to make as he supposed two motions, the first (that which he did submit) that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. The Chair supposed he was to follow that by the motion to adjourn, but recognized the gentleman from Indiana under the supposition that the gentleman from Illinois had yielded to him. Such, however, was not the fact. The Chair therefore is compelled reluctantly to overrule the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is one of the instances, against all of which I protest, of a gentleman undertaking to control the action of the House against measures which he does not approve. I hope it is not to be the rule that we are not to get information before this House to be the rule that we are not to get information before this House unless other members consent.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,
By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Evans for ten days from Saturday last, on account of important business; to Mr. Clarke, of Kentucky, for five days, on account of important business; to Mr. HARTZELL indefinitely, on account of sickness in his

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. Morrison that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say in connection with these petitions that I receive, as perhaps other Senators do, petitions asking the repeal of the bankrupt law, addressed not to Congress nor to the Senate, but individually addressed. I understand under the rules of the Senate it is not in order to present such papers. Doubtless they are so directed by inadvertence. I do not feel at liberty to present them as petitions, but I think it proper to say that they come to me in considerable numbers, and I withhold them only because I suppose considerable numbers, and I withhold them only because I suppose the rule of the Senate excludes them.

Mr. MORTON. I also have received a number of petitions, which were addressed to myself instead of being addressed to the Senate, for the repeal of the bankrupt law. I suppose under the rule I cannot present them here as petitions, but I desire to state the fact.

Mr. BOOTH presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of such action by the General Land Office as will put a stop to further fraudulent additional homestead claims, and in favor of the presented a law requiring that all additional homestead entries the passage of a law requiring that all additional homestead entries in that State shall be made by application in person to the register and receiver; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORTON. I present the petition of over 15,000 women of Indiana and nearly 14,000 voters of that State, on the subject of temperance. As this petition is signed so largely and respectably by the voters and by the mothers, wives, and daughters of Indiana, I ask that it may be read, published in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petition was read and referred to the Committee on Finance,

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas the liquor traffic is fraught with evil to the property, health, homes, lives, and peace of our citizens; and whereas governments are instituted to secure the peace, prosperity, and well-being of the citizens: Therefore, We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Indiana, hereby pray your honorable

We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Indiana, hereby pray your honorable body—.

First. To appoint a commission to investigate and report the effects of the liquor traffic in the United States on the health, intelligence, industry, prosperity, crime, and papperism of the individuals; also upon taxation, revenue, and the general welfare of the country.

Second. To prohibit the importation of alcoholic liquors from foreign countries. Third. To prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the District of Columbia, in the Territories of the United States, and in all places where Congress exercises exclusive legislation.

Fourth. To require total abstinence from alcoholic liquors as a beverage on the part of all officials and subordinates in the civil, military, and naval service of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I present the petition of Robert Smalls, of South Carolina, setting forth that on the 13th of May, 1862, he captured the steamer Planter in the harbor of Charleston, took her out of the harbor, and delivered her to the commander of the United States squadron, and that her value at that time was over $50,000. It was a gallant achievement, and excited much attention at the time. Had a garant achievement, and excited much attention at the time. Had he been an officer of the Navy he would have received a large sum of prize-money. As it was, he received but a small sum. I present the petition on his behalf for his relief, and I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs especially to this petition, and ask its consideration by that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORTON. I present ten petitions, signed by some 2,000 citizens of Indiana and Kentucky, praying Congress to adopt such legislation as will facilitate the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad. They say:

The undersigned believe that Congress should, under proper guarantees, extend the national credit to the completion of a great southern line to the Pacific; and that the guarantee of interest upon the bonds of the company, protected by a first mortgage and a lien upon all the revenues of the road, is so secured that no liability can result from the same.

I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Rail-

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Page & Moran and others, citizens of Louisiana, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEST. As an evidence that Louisiana is not always unanimous, I present the memorial of A. Ensminger and other citizens of that State, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that it be also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of Mary A. Neilson, Thomas H. Neilson, Mary T. Neilson Jackson, and Fannie Neilson Wells, heirs and representatives of Hall Neilson, deceased, praying for an appropriation of $91,000 to re-imburse them for money expended by Hall Neilson on certain property; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Abraham P. Drost, late of Company D, Thirty-fifth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, praying the passage of a law directing the correction of his muster-roll so as to authorize him to receive three months' pay as first lieutenant to May 1, 1865, and three months' pay allowed to all officers mustered before that date; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Cole, Sizer & Brink, praying to be compensated for damages alleged to have arisen to them by the failure of the War Department to carry out the terms of a purchase by them from the Government through General O. Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill (S. Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William L. No. 479) for the relief of William L. Adams, late collector of customs at Astoria, Oregon.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

De Leon, praying compensation for injury to their property in Albuquerque, New Mexico, by its being burned by United States troops, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. In connection with this report, I wish to state in regard to this as well as several other reports that I shall make the grounds upon which we make this recommendation. In this case the petition is not signed, it is not sworn to; there is no evidence of the loss of the property by any action of our troops; there is no evidence of the value of the property; and there is no evidence of its ownership. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Kelly, of Alleghany County, Virginia, praying for a rehearing of a disallowed claim by the claims commission, or that the same be referred to the Court of Claims, have had it under considersame be referred to the Court of Chains, have had it inher consideration and ask to be discharged, for the reason that the petitioner in this case seeks to have reviewed the action of the commissioners of claims without any additional testimony and upon points which were expressly ruled by the commission.

the petition.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of Mark W. Delahay, recommend that it be indefinitely postponed for the reason that there is no proof sustaining the affidavit of the petitioner, and nothing to show that he ever made application to the Treasury for his pay, or if he did make such application that pay there was refused to him. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS subsequently said: My attention has just been called to the fact that the Committee on Claims recommended the indefinite postponement of the bill for the relief of Mark W. Delahay. I do not understand the grounds upon which that recommendation was made, whether upon the merits or upon the fact that no testimony accompanied the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. No testimony accompanied the bill. There was nothing to show that he had made application to the Treasury Department for his pay, or that he had been refused it there.

Mr. INGALLS. The fact is that application has been made and payment refused, and I would like, if possible, to have that matter again considered by the committee if this bill has not been acted upon on

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to get through with my other reports he can then move a reconsideration of the action of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Claims I ask that the bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of Mark W. Delahay, which was indefinitely postponed this morning be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. WRIGHT. The committee on Claims, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying for an extension of the time within which claims for losses suffered during the war and supplies furnished to the Army of the United States may be filed and prosecuted before the southern claims commission, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The same question has frequently been before the committee, and we have uniformly refrued the states of the committee, and we have uniformly refused to extend the time.

the petition.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Richard W. Adams, executor of the estate of Thomas M. Newell, deceased, praying to be paid interest on the sum of $1,455, from October, 1836, to March, 1857, that sum having been withheld from him, as he says, from pay due as commandant in the United States Navy, by the Treasurer of the United States, have had the same under conjugation of the conjugation of t sideration and instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged, for the reason that we have uniformly opposed the payment of interest on these claims, and for the further reason that there is nothing to show that this party is the executor or administrator of this estate.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. I will state the reason for this recommendation. It seems by the preamble to this bill that Mr. Robinson asserts that he was lately the clerk of the house of representatives of the Legislature, or General Court, of Massachusetts; that he paid a tax to the General Government upon his income as such clerk; that he has not been repaid the tax that he thus paid to the General Government; and that he failed to make his application in time under the law. He now asks that he may be allowed to apply to the Treasury and have this tax refunded. We find that there is nothing to sustain the averments in the preamble. We also conclude that it is a matter of grave doubt as to whether this tax ever should have been refunded, and we are not disposed to open the doors of the Treasury in a doubtful case. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John W. Robinson, of Hinds County, Mississippi, asking that compensation for certain goods, wares, and merchandise taken and destroyed by the United States Army at Jackson, Mississippi, during the late war, be paid him, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, for the reason that as to the property taken it is clearly apparent that it was cognizable by the southern claims commission; and, as to the property that he claims was destroyed by our troops, there is nothing to show but that the destruction was the result of the wanton act of soldiers and officers. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the pe-States mail on route No. 6140 in Georgia, from July 1 to October 31, 1870, have directed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. It seems, according to the petitioner's own statement, that he was a subcontractor under one Doherty; that Doherty's contract was suspended, and that the Government refused to pay Doherty for the reason that he was a delinquent or defaulter under another contract, and now La Rose, the subcontractor, asks that the Government shall pay him. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James M. Lyles, of Newton County, Mississippi, praying compensation for twelve bales of cotton taken from him by the United States after the close of the war, have directed me to report adversely and ask to be discharged; and as a ground for this recommendation I will state that there is no loyalty of the petitioner shown nor anything to explain why the claim was not presented to the proper Department of the Government. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of this petition.

The motion was agreed to.

B. P. PATTERSON.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 140) for the relief of B. P. Patterson, have directed me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I wish to state that this bill was reported unanimously by the committee at the last session and was passed by the Senate. It is for the sum of $20, lost by Mr. Patterson as a postmaster in Oregon by reason of the destruction of his house where the money was. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The preamble recites that in the month of April, 1874, the post-office building at La Grande, Oregon, was destroyed by fire, and among other property therein lost and deor negligence on the part of B. P. Patterson, postmaster at La Grande, and that Patterson has paid to the United States the sum of $20. The bill therefore provides for the payment to B. P. Patterson of $20, to re-imburse him therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution relative to the publication of the proceedings and debates in the Congressional Record, have instructed me to report back the same without amendment and recommend its passage. This resolution substantially passed the Senate at a previous session and I believe without any dissent. If there be no objection, I would like

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the reports in the Congressional Record shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their authors for correction, they shall be returned to the reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and, if not so returned, they shall then be printed in the Congressional Record from the original notes of the reporter.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been suggested to me in various quarters that the allowance of a week for revising speeches is altogether too great. I report the resolution as instructed by the committee; but if any Senator proposes a shorter time, though I am not authorized to speak for the committee in that respect, I shall be very ready myself to assent to it. We are aware that the debates which appear in the RECORD every morning may be corrected for the permanent publication that is bound, and the latter, the stereotype edition, is generally a week behind the former, so that a week's delay would not in any way I think impede the prompt publication of the bound volume; but if the time is thought to be unnecessarily long I shall be quite content with a shorter period.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt that there is a cause for the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island. With certain amendments I should be glad to see the resolution adopted; but it seems to me that there are phrases which rather conflict with each other and are liable to variant constructions. For instance, the resolution provides that no speech shall be published in the Record which was not spoken in the Senate or House of Representatives; and that I think is considered. is eminently proper, because it is meant to be a record of actual de-bates and not a publication of essays or compositions which no one has heard, and which therefore are not properly to be recorded as

And such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered; without omission, alteration, or addition, except verbal alterations made by the author of

A speech is composed of words, and a verbal alteration is of the very essence of the speech, applying to any omission, or addition, or qualification. It seems to me that there must be a sense of discretion and propriety governing the amount of the corrections which a Senator or Representative would feel himself justified in making in his speech. There is a great deal often in the heat of debate of carelessness, tautology, and repetition, or a part of a speech may have a very slovenly appearance, as the saying is, in a printed form. There may be absolute errors and misconstructions by the reporters of what was said—
I have frequently seen such instances—so that the sense of the speaker was misapprehended, or in some cases he may have carelessly stated was misapprehended, or in some cases he may have carelessly stated precisely the opposite of what he meant, as by the omission of the word "not," which has oftentimes occurred in speeches. Then again would come the very proper discretion of omitting from the printed record of debate something that was unkind, which a man upon deliberation would not desire to have recorded, something personal, which for the sake of all parties had better be dropped; because we are here for public business and not for private affairs. I think that there should be a discretion resting with Senators touching all such matters not pertinent to the subject which upon reflection they might matters not pertinent to the subject which upon reflection they might desire to have left out. Of course this would not have reference to the part taken by others in debate. No honorable man would so amend his own speech as to place the debate of another in any disadvantage, or interpolate in his speech remarks which he had not made vantage, or interpolate in his speech remarks which he had not made which had in any degree a bearing upon the language of another, or his declarations in regard to another Senator.

There may be errors of fact, as I say, which ought to be amended, and should very properly be amended, concerning nobody but the mere accuracy of the speaker. Now, if the Senator provides that a member shall not alter, omit, or add to a speech, and yet in the next phrase provides for verbal alterations by the author, it seems to me had a valing an inconsistency, and I would suggest to him that the he is making an inconsistency; and I would suggest to him that the words "without omission, alteration, or addition" be dropped from his resolution, because they are covered in the general provision that the speech shall be printed as it is actually delivered, except verbal alterations made by the author of the speech. I think that discretion is a proper one. I think it tends to justice. I think it tends to decorum. I think it tends to discharge from the RECORD a great deal of matter that is uttered in the heat of discussion and oftentimes under a misapprehension. I do not see who is to be kurt in any way; but on the contrary, so far as the record of debates can benefit any one, it seems to me that inaccuracies of expression, perhaps the bad formation of sentences, tautological phrases, could be omitted from the RECORD, and I think it ought to be in the power of a Senator who makes a speech to amend it in that way; and yet the language of this resolution would seem in one breath to exclude such right and in the other to admit it. I suggest that the Senator from Rhode Island would make his resolution clearer and less open to exception if he would omit the words to which I have referred.

if he would omit the words to which I have referred.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that. I do not think it alters the sense at all. When the resolution says that the speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, the words "without omission, alteration, or addition" may be considered as tautological; but I think the term "verbal corrections" is well understood.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the words are contradictory to what follows that Mr. ANTHONY. Not contradictory, because it says "excepting verbal corrections." That saves it from contradiction.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the exception carries the whole of what pre-

Mr. ANTHONY. That is according to the definition you give to the term "verbal correction." The word "verbal" is an adjudicated word, I think, in parliamentary law. You frequently say, sir, when an amendment is proposed "it is a mere verbal amendment, and it will be considered as adopted unless it be objected to." It is an amendment which alters the form of an expression without altering the substance of it.

Mr. BAYARD. A verbal amendment may most materially alter the meaning. The difference between "guilty" and "not guilty" is a mere matter of verbal alteration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I differ with the Senator entirely on that. A verbal alteration I understand to be an alteration which alters the form of expressing a fact or an argument, without altering the fact or the argument itself, omitting a tautology or redundancy, correcting an error of style, of rhetoric, or of syntax possibly. Suppose a plural noun and a singular verb are joined together in the haste of speaking, which sometimes will happen with the best speakers, the correction of that is a verbal correction; but to put in the word "not" or to omit the word "not" is a great deal more than a verbal correction.

However, my object is the same as that of the Senator from Delaware. I desire that the RECORD shall be what it purports to be: a record of the proceedings and the debates of Congress; and while I think it is proper that a Senator should have an opportunity to make what I call "verbal corrections," to correct little errors that are always liable to occur in extemporaneous speaking, I am perfectly willing to surrender it and agree that the RECORD shall be literally what was said, and that any correction shall be made the next day by the Senator or Representative, and then go in the RECORD as part of the proceedings, or be recorded in a foot-note. I think errors of fact should be put either in the form of a note by way of correction or should be corrected on the floor the next day

Mr. BAYARD. I ask if the Senator from Rhode Island accepts the

Mr. BATARD. I ask it is selected from kindle island accepts the amendment I proposed?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand the amendment of the Senator; will he repeat it?

Mr. BAYARD. I moved to strike out the words "without omission, alteration, or addition." Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection, because I think it is entirely covered by the phrase, "printed as they were actually delivered." Speeches cannot be printed as "actually delivered" if there be any omission, addition, or alteration."

Mr. MORTON. I am in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware, but I would have it go further. As this resolution stands it allows no alteration except merely verbal alterations going to the matter of style. In an experience here of some years I have never known any changes made in a speech that I thought were really injurious to the RECORD. I have known Senators sometimes to strike out something that they had said, but I believe as a general thing it was proper for them to do so. Sometimes errors somewhat personal are put into a speech which in a cooler moment the Senator would strike out, and I see no objection to allowing him to strike them out. Sometimes an error of statement is made, an error of fact, and in looking over it the Senator would desire to strike it out, and I see no objection to allowing that.

I think that this requirement that a speech shall be published precisely as it was delivered will act rather as a restraint upon debate and will be an injury instead of a benefit. This right to alter a speech I have never seen abused in this body so far as I know, and I do not see any necessity for a change of the rule. I would not allow any speech to be published that was not delivered. I think that the sense of propriety would restrain such alterations or changes in a speech as would make it materially different, substantially different, from what was said in its material parts.

It seems to me that it would be better to leave this matter just as it is. I think the inconvenience to result from the adoption of this new rule would be greater than the evil to be remedied. I do not new rule would be greater than the evil to be remedied. I do not know how it may be in the other House; but so far as my experience goes here I have never seen the right to amend a speech abused substantially in this body. I have occasionally said a thing here that I would be glad to leave out, but nothing ever affecting the argument or the position of any other Senator. I have perhaps exercised this privilege of striking out as seldom almost as any member on this floor, and yet I should be sorry to have it taken away entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose that in a running debate, in a colloquy, which very frequently occurs between two Senators, there is a misapprehension or a misstatement in reference to the action of one Senators.

apprehension or a misstatement in reference to the action of one Senator, and they both agree that what has passed between them shall be left out of the RECORD, which I have known to be done, because there was something offensive; there certainly could be no impropri-ety in that. That is about as far as I have noticed where matter which has been spoken in the Senate has been left out of the RECORD. It seems to me that that is perfectly proper. Where matters occur in the Senate that those concerned dislike very much, after the heat of debate has passed away, to have appear in the RECORD, why should they not have the privilege of striking it out by the consent of both parties?

I presume the objection of the committee is on account of so many written speeches being published in the RECORD without having been delivered in the House of Representatives. While I served in the House, I thought it was better that the rule as observed there and here should be still observed. If those speeches are not permitted to be printed in the RECORD, somebody will have the infliction of listentiate them because they will be under Nearly every member desires. ing to them, because they will be made. Nearly every member desires to say something to send to his constituents, and almost always does. If it is written and not permitted to be published without being repeated in the House, it will be repeated there. So your rule will not peated in the House, it will be repeated there. So your rule will not have any effect so far as that is concerned.

The effect, in my judgment, will be, if you disallow corrections as they have been made in the Senate—I think not to the injury of the RECORD or the debate either as practiced in the Senate—to drive many persons perhaps to writing their speeches and delivering them in the Senate as written essays: a practice that certainly ought not to be indulged in this body to a very great extent. It is sometimes indulged in to a greater extent than it was some years ago. I think that would be the tendency of this new rule. If you disallow corrections that would be the tendency of this new rule. If you disallow correct that would be the tendency of this new rule. It you disallow corrections to be made where they are not of a material character, it will naturally incline persons to write out their speeches and read them to the Senate because they desire to have them presented correctly when they go into the Record. This is the inducement that strikes me.

It is a fact I believe known to all that where there are spirited debates in times of excitement in deliberative bodies members are not so careful of their utterances as they are in their cooler moments. Many times the language used is not of the character precisely that we desire to have appear in the Record; and where a change does not materially modify or alter the substance or sense of sentences, it not materially modify or alter the substance or sense of sentence, it certainly does seem to me that no injury can arise from allowing an alteration or correction to be made. For that reason it does seem to me that the rule as we have had it heretofore is a good enough rule, at least for this body; and I say, as the Senator from Indiana has said, that I have never noticed the violation of the rule to such an extent as to make it offensive.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As one of the members of the Committee on Printing I consented to the reporting of this resolution, reserving, however, to myself the right on more reflection, if I should see proper, to object to it. I think the amendment offered by my colleague is a very proper one. Certainly, we all make speeches here, sometimes, without much preparation, and in which there may occur expressions and views that we do not want to publish to the world, and which we would not on reflection desire to stand by. But I have great doubt about the propriety of excluding from the RECORD some speeches which are prepared and are not actually delivered in either House of which are prepared and are not actuarly delivered in either House of Congress. The Senator from Illinois has suggested that unless members be permitted to have published their speeches some persons would be under the necessity of listening to them, and that this would be an infliction placed upon them; but I apprehend that the House of Representatives is so large that it is utterly impossible for every member there properly to discuss all the questions that come up, and it is not to be presumed that the House would do injustice to its own members by excluding full debate; and if this rule were adopted, it occurs to me that it would retard the proper course of legislation. If members have the liberty of publishing speeches that they intended to deliver on any given subject, they will not be particular about taking up the time in reading or delivering such speeches to the House; but if gentlemen are to be excluded from the publication of their speeches, if gentlemen are to be excluded from the publication of their speeches, then they will ask as a matter of right to be heard on every question that comes up. The tendency of course will be to retard legislation in the other House of Congress, for, as I before said, it is not to be presumed that the House would be so unjust to any member when a question came up on which he wished to express his views as to cut him off from debate and from an opportunity to publish his views.

I take it, then, that if this resolution is adopted it will eventuate either in a repeal of the rule at no very distant period or the legislation in the other House of Congress will be so materially delayed that proper attention cannot be given to it. I doubt seriously, therefore, whether that provision which seems to meet with favor in the Senter, which excludes written speeches not delivered in the other House.

ate, which excludes written speeches not delivered in the other House, is a proper and wise provision. At any rate I throw out this sugges-tion for the consideration of members of the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, this movement on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island is certainly one in the right direction, but it does not go quite as far as I should like to see it go. Therefore I shall venture to propose an amendment.

It has been said that nothing has caused decay in American oratory and in debate in the two Houses of Congress so much as the reading from the desk of the member a printed or written speech. The object that I understand the printing of the RECORD to attain is to give to the country the proceedings of Congress and the actual running debates that take place from day to day. It has long since lost that character, and now almost every morning we find the RECORD—I speak it in a parliamentary and respectful way—loaded down with speeches that have been prepared for a long period of time, sometimes read, and sometimes not read at all. It seems to me a growing evil which ought to be stopped, and I therefore propose the following amendment:

And no speech shall be published which has been read in either House from manuscript or printed slips.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the only evil in this regard, so far as my observation has gone, that needs a remedy is the printing of speeches that never were delivered. Such a thing, I believe, has never taken place in the Senate. I remember one occasion, and but one since I have had a seat on this floor, in which a Senator asked leave to print a written speech, which he had in his hand, without de-livering it to the Senate; and there was such a manifestation of dis-sent that he withdrew his request. There never, therefore, has been in the Senate this evil practice of printing speeches that never were

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me to correct him. There are instances, and I can show them to him, where speeches have been printed in the Congressional Globe that were not delivered in the Senate, where by vote of the Senate permission has been given.

Mr. THURMAN. I never have known it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator was a member of the body when the vote was passed.

Mr. THURMAN. I never before heard of that incident. It is news Mr. THÜRMAN. I never before heard of that incident. It is news to me. If such a proposition were made, and I were here, I should certainly have opposed it and voted against it. That has not been the practice of the Senate, and I trust there never will be such a thing permitted. But in the other House the practice has grown up by leave of the House to permit the printing in the Record of a speech that has not been delivered in the House. That is a matter which concerns the House alone. It does not concern us; it does not interfere with the business of the Senate in any way, and if it is an evil that needs a remedy, it seems to me that the remedy should be applied where the evil exists, and that is in the House of Representatives. When that evil becomes unbearable that House will not fail to provide a remedy, and I think it will be considered somewhat ungracious on the part of the Senate to attempt to correct an evil that gracious on the part of the Senate to attempt to correct an evil that does not exist in this body, but simply exists in the mode of procedure in the other House. For that reason it seems to me that this resolution should have originated in the House and not in the Senate.

Now, with respect to that which does apply to the Senate, the resolution is that the reports-

Shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered without omission, alteration, or addition, except verbal alterations made by the author of the speech and by no other

So far as that is concerned I wish to state very briefly that I do not know any member of this body who would be less affected by such a rule, if it were adopted, than I should be, for I really believe that in the seven years that I have been on this floor I have never corrected more than half a dozen of the remarks that I have delivered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only, I suggest, where it was absolutely necessary to make corrections sary to make corrections.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been sometimes ashamed, when I have read over the Congressional Record, to see what I have said, [laughter,] and have been very sorry that I had not taken the pains to correct it. I have no doubt about that. I have seen errors that were not my errors, but that happened accidentally by typographical mistakes, that I should have liked very well to correct; but it was too late. I only mention this to show that I have no particular personal interest in this matter; but I must say that this power of revising a speech I have never within my knowledge known abused in the Senate. It may have been abused without my knowing it; I have never myself known it abused, and I never have left out in the publication of any speech that I have ever delivered in the Senate any material matter whatever, except in one instance, and I will frankly confess that.

In arguing the Caldwell case I misapprehended a statement in the report of the committee, and, misapprehending that statement, in my argument I made a calculation that was altogether wrong. My attention was called to it immediately after I sat down by some Senator. I revised the speech and left out that misstatement of fact; but not until after my friend from New York [Mr. Conkling] had given me a severe pounding on account of that very thing; and that perhaps did him injustice, because, if anybody had taken the trouble to read his speech and mine, he would seem to be pounding the air, having no foundation for the work of his sledge-hammer. But that, which was a mere correction of fact, where I did not publish an erroneous statement of fact is the only substantial ornission I recollect to have every ment of fact, is the only substantial omission I recollect to have ever made; and now, upon recollection, I certainly think it would have head; and now, dpon reconcerton, I certainly think it would have been better (though it did not occur to me at the time) to have put a note to my speech correcting the error, instead of striking it out. If I had known that my friend from New York was going to mand me on that account, I should have corrected it in a note; but I did not think he was going to do any such thing, knowing his amiable character. I do not believe there is any danger of abuse in the Senate if we go on as we have done.

I want to say one thing further. What will this resolution effect if it be adopted? It certainly is not intended that the reporter or the Congressional Printer is to compare the revised speech with the original notes of the reporter to decide whether our amendments are verbal or substantial. I am sure the Senator from Rhode Island does not intend that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not suppose that any Senator would be guilty of such an indecorum as to violate a rule of the Senate when it had been adopted.

Mr. THURMAN. That is precisely what I supposed.
Mr. ANTHONY. I would leave it to every Senator's own sense of what is right.

Mr. THÜRMAN. That is precisely what I supposed. The question, then, what is a verbal amendment or not is to be determined by each Senator for himself.

Mr. ANTHONY. A verbal amendment is an amendment which alters the phraseology without altering the substance of what is said, and it is just as well adjudicated as the term "due diligence" or any other legal phrase.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend is unfortunate. If he were a lawyer he would know that there is no more uncertain term in the law than the term "due diligence."

Mr. ANTHONY. I had one controversy on the law as to a statute with my friend from Ohio, in which I came out victorious; but I will mot attempt another one.

Mr. THURMAN. I have but a word more to say. Each Senator, then, is to judge for himself what is a verbal amendment. Certainly it is not intended that the reporters, even if they had the time, which they have not, should be constituted the judges to see whether we have gone beyond verbal amendments. Then it is left to each Senator to obey the rule. The rule is no stronger than the sense of honor of each Senator; and the more you leave Senators to be responsible as honorable men, untrammeled by rules, the easier we get along in this body; and it is one of the great reasons why we do get along so pleasantly that we are not restrained so much by rule, but each one is left to act according to his sense of honor and propriety.

DISTRICT COURT IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent, at this stage of this interesting debate, at the request of my honorable friend from West Virginia, to report from the Committee on the Judiciary for present consideration the bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia; and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside the present order for the purpose of considering the bill reported by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears no objection. •

The bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the regular terms of the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall hereafter be held at the times and places following; but when any of said dates shall fall on Sunday, the terms shall commence on the following Monday: At Clarksburgh, on the first days of March and September; at Wheeling, on the first days of April and October; and at Charleston, on the first days of May and October.

The bill was reported with amendments by the Committee on the Indicious.

Judiciary.

The first amendment was after the word "that," in the third line, to insert "instead of the times now provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following:

And all pending process, suits, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner, and with the same effect, except as to time, as if this act had not passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1398) to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1802) making an appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June 1876; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADVANCES BY STATES.

Mr. JOHNSTON. On the 11th of this month I introduced a bill (S. No. 432) to re-open, state, and settle the claims of the several States against the United States for advances made in the war of 1812, which I had referred to the Committee on Claims. I desired to be heard before that committee in regard to the bill and asked the chairman of the committee to make that known to the committee, but he forgot to do so. The committee acted on the bill and reported adversely. I did not observe the adverse report, and did not have an opportunity, therefore, to make a motion to reconsider in proper time. I now ask unanimous consent of the Senate to submit a motion to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say that I understand the Senator from Virginia made known his wishes to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAPERTON] who had the bill in charge. The Senator from West Virginia was absent when the bill was considered by the committee, and therefore failed to make known the wishes of the Senator from Virginia. There is no objection, therefore, to the reconsidera-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The vote indefinitely postponing the bill is reconsidered and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is what I desire.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the morning hour for the purpose of receiving morning business? The Chair hears no objection. If there are no further reports the introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of unserviceable material, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 481) for the relief of Israel Yount; which was read twice by its title, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 482) for the repeal of so much of the act of December 17, 1872, as provides for a pivot-draw in any bridge to be erected across the Ohio River between the cities of Covington, Kentucky, and Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 483) to regulate elections and the elective franchise in the Territory of Utah; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 484) to restore to William G. Langford the possession of a tract of land in Idaho Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 485) for the relief of Julia E. Seeley, postmaster at Great Barrington, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 486) fixing the times and places for holding certain terms of the district court of the United States for the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to know what became of my poor

resolution?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was laid aside temporarily, to get through with the morning business.
Mr. ANTHONY. All right.
Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 487) to amend chapter 7 of title 53 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 488) for the relief of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, providing for a part of said tribe to become citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Christopher Stuck be taken from the files of the Senate, copies being left with the Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, imitating the Senator from Rhode Island, I should like a piece of information from the Chair. What has become, I would inquire, of the unfinished business, the bill touching jurisdiction in the Indian reservations, which was under consideration at the last meeting of the Senate and was informally laid aside by consent to take up a privileged matter, the report of a committee of conference, the understanding being that it was to be left the unfinished business !

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Before the Senate adjourned on Monday the Chair took pains to call the attention of the Senate to that bill, that it might be left as the unfinished business of the day. In the absence of the Senator this morning, the Chair obtained the consent of the Senate that it be postponed until after the morning business and the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island subject to a call for the regular order. If the Senator from New York now calls for the regular order, the Chair will submit the unfinished busines

Mr. CONKLING. I will make that call unless it will discommode the Senator from Rhode Island, which I would not like to do. Mr. ANTHONY. I would not press this resolution against the regular order of business; but it seems to me that every Senator who has spoken has been in favor of the first part of the resolution, and if that will meet the general assent of the Senate I would be content in imitation of the late Vice-President to take what I can get and try to get the rest at some other time.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Anthony] is before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. The first part of the resolution is "That the reports in the Congressional Record shall be an accurate transcript. of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress."

Does anybody object to that P Next: "And that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives." I think if we can go as far as that, it will be something toward the redemption of the Cengressional Record from the discredit which it has fallen into before the country of being, not a transcript of what was said and done here, but a transcript of what was not said, holding forth as the reason for passing or for rejecting measures something that never was said.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would leave the habit of correction just as

Mr. ANTHONY. Just as it is now. I ought to thank my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Logan,] who is the only Senator who has spoken in favor of this resolution, although he pretended to speak against it, because he said that one of its great evils would be that it would compel Senators to be very careful in their speeches and in their personal colloquies, because they would know that whatever they said would go into the Congressional Record. I think that is a strong argument in favor of that part of the resolution which I am willing to omit if the other part will be acceptable to the Senate, but of course I do not wish to press it against the wishes of Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very much in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island; but it does not go far enough for my idea. I have no doubt that if we had the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reduced as Hansard's Debates are, that is, a clear, brief, comprehensive digest of the proceedings in Congress, it would be much more valuable and cost about one-third the money, but I do not suppose that Congress will consent to so great a reform.

I can see in the RECORD of yesterday, now before me, how easy it would be to condense the first half-dozen pages into one single page by saying that restitions were presented on certain subjects by Says.

by saying that petitions were presented on certain subjects by Senator this and Senator that, and so on. What is the use of repeating every word that is delivered? What is the use of reporting the frequent debates we have as to our order of business? What is the use of reporting colloquies and reporting for all time a great variety of debate that occurs in this body and in all legislative bodies? An intelligent reporter sitting before us, knowing the relative importance of what is said, and the subject-matters that are pending, and the character of the business pending, will give a clear, comprehensive, and distinct statement of all that occurs, of every word that is uttered in debate that is worth preserving, in a comparatively few lines, and give us the proceedings of a session of Congress in two volumes instead of in six. Then we should be able to find really what is done. Now I would rather undertake to find a fact anywhere else than in the Congressional Record, because it is so voluminous that even the index of a single Senator's name would confuse him, so that it would be impossible to pursue his inquiries very far.

I am, therefore, willing to go a great deal further than the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island proposes; but at the same time I know from what has already been said that the Senate is so restive about this matter and there is such a difference of opinion in regard to it that I fear very much that this proposition will never pass the House of Representatives; that they will never surrender their right of getting rid of being bored with speeches an hour long, that they do of getting rid of being bored with speeches an hour long, that they do not want to hear, by allowing men to print them in the RECORD, where nobody will read them. Still I am willing to vote for it. I will vote for it very cheerfully, and I am willing then to go further and make the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a record of the material facts occurring here, and not of all that is said and all the looseness of our proceedings.

Mr. ANTHONY. In deference to what seems to be the judgment of the Senate, but not according to my own judgment at all, I move to strike out all after the word "Representatives;" so that the resolution will read:

That the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress; and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORTON. It has occurred to me many times since I have been a member of this body that, if an arrangement could be made by which a member of this body that, if an arrangement could be made by which there should be an official condensed report published of the debates of this body, it would be of great service to Congress and the country. Our debates as they take place here are not published by the press. They are too voluminous for that. The largest city newspapers cannot afford to publish them; but they publish a speech now and then of particular interest. The Associated Press undertakes to send out a synopsis of the debates. The reporter does the best he can, and I wonder he can do as well as he does. But if there could be a condensed report made out under the authority of this body, which should be strictly impartial and which would give the substance of what is said here in the smallest space, such a report would be published by the weekly papers of the country, and to a great extent be lished by the weekly papers of the country, and to a great extent be published by the dailies, and the people of the country would be able to see the substance of what is said here. As it is now they cannot. The Associated Press report, let them do the best they can, is but a very meager statement of what is done; and it is under the control of a private association, that may cut off such parts as it sees proper; may send one part West and another part South. There have been complaints on that subject in the last few years. I have frequently heard them expressed in this body. Charges of favoritism have been made in regard to particular subjects, and sometimes in regard to particular Senators. But I believe that one great reform which could be made—and which I hope will be made some time—is that there shall be a condensed report of these debates, made so short that the newspapers of the country can publish it, an impartial report that would do justice to all topics and do justice to all Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution is proposed to be modified so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress; and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representa-

Mr. COCKRELL. What has become of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The chairman has taken the privi-

the Fire Fire Processing the computer of the Charles and the provide ge of modifying his resolution, no amendment having been made. The Secretary will report the resolution as modified by the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be modified.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to add to that the amendment which I offered before:

And no speech shall be published which has been read in either House from manuscript or printed slips.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think I can conform myself to any rule that may be adopted by the Senate. I sometimes deliver speeches here from manuscript; and, if I should be compelled to deliver them extemporaneously, I think they might perhaps be twice as long and twice as uninteresting. In doing this, however, I but follow the example of other and more distinguished Senators. I remember now one of the ablest and most eloquent speeches that have been delivered in this body was delivered from manuscript by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. Ransom.] But a few days ago the senior Senator from Ohio in point of years, if not of service, [Mr. Thurman,] delivered a strong legal argument on the Louisiana case from manuscript. 1 restrong legal argument on the Louisiana case from manuscript. I remember also that a Senator here a few years ago that was called by all of his eulogists—he being now deceased—"the model Senator," was nearly always in the habit of delivering his speeches from manuscript or from printed slips. I mean the late Mr. Sumner. I could also name a brilliant Senator from Missouri who was frequently in the habit of delivering his speeches from manuscript. Why, sir, some of the most important arguments that we have had here for the last five or six years by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] have been from manuscript.

Mr. President, I think, so far as my observation is concerned, that it is paying due deference to the Senate to properly consider any matter that is spoken here, whether delivered extemporaneously or from manuscript. If it has not received the attention from the Senator that will enable him to deliver it extemporaneously—requiring as much time, if not more, than it does to write it out—it seems to me that he pays no less respect to the Senate to carefully prepare it in manuscript and then deliver it here. So far as that is concerned, it may be that Senators who have had the advantage of early training and education and are able to speak extemporaneously as well as they can from further deliberation might be able to cut off some of us who from further deliberation might be able to cut off some of us who are younger Senators from the privileges that we have heretofore enjoyed; but, so far as I am concerned, I am quite ready to adopt the most stringent rule that can be adopted here on this subject, for I must admit that it is a great evil that any speeches not delivered in either House should be suffered to be printed in the record of our proceedings.

Then, Mr. President, when you come to the "verbal corrections" I must confess that I am in the habit when speaking extemporaneously of commencing nearly every sentence with "now." When I see the Record, I like to strike that word out. I want to give the privilege to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] when he speaks to strike out "that will never do, sir." [Laughter.] I also want to give the privilege to some other Senators, and I do not know but if my colleague was here I would mention one of his words that I would like to give him an opportunity to strike out.

I hardly think that the resolution is needed at all. So far as my experience goes, when I have undertaken to correct my manuscript, I have found that I have made about as poor a job of it as I should had I let it alone, and perhaps I should have succeeded much better to allow the reporter to put it in such shape as he might see fit. Under these circumstances, Mr. President, it seems to me that we had better let the resolution go by. I have no idea that the House will adopt this resolution if we pass it; and what is the inconvenience here? If a Senator comes in with manuscript or printed slips, and they are read, Senators all believe that everything is going on right, and they at once take the liberty to depart from their seats, and allow the Senator who is reading to have it all to himself. So that I hardly think there is very much of value which can be secured in the resolution.

there is very much of value which can be secured in the resolution. At the same time I am willing to accept of any proposition that may meet with the wishes of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this subject has been ventilated before the Senate, quite a variety of views expressed, and a good deal of information communicated to the committee; therefore I move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee. move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Printing. The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuation of the work on the building for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now present the unfinished business

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 810. Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps the Senator from Iowa does not know that there is a bill before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I was aware of that, but I have no particular preference about it. I desire to call up this bill immediately after.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business before the Senate is Senate bill No. 32.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 32) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts, and for the punishment of crimes committed by and against Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MORTON. Let the bill be read as amended.

The bill was read as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Upon whose motion was the proviso inserted at the close of the second section? My understanding is that the Senate did not act upon that amendment which was proposed to be offered the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was proposed by the Senator from Iowa and agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. It does not so appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does on the minutes of the Secre-

Mr. INGALLS. I think it must be a mistake.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that that amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa confirms the view of the Chair as affirmed by the minutes. There may be, perhaps, an error in the RECORD.

Mr. INGALLS. I was occupying the chair at the time when this bill was last under consideration. My recollection is that the Senator from Iowa suggested an amendment like that incorporated in this proviso, but that the bill being in Committee of the Whole and the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary being under consideration, he concluded to leave the matter until the bill should be reported to the Senate, and I must still insist that the action as reported by the Clerk is erroneous.

by the Clerk is erroneous.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I think he confounds two things. I made a suggestion with reference to the third section, and the Senator from Kansas, who was then in the chair, suggested that I could attain my object better after the bill was reported to the Senate, and I waived the point I then wished to make. If the Senator will turn to page 13 of the RECORD of yesterday he will find on the first column that the amendment offered by me to section 2 was agreed to. That appears in the RECORD itself. Mr. Allison. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of section 2,

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Clerk report the amendment again? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent the cutting of such timber or grass, or the use of such stone as may be necessary for the purposes of the Army, or for the use of the several agencies located on any such reservation.

Mr. INGALLS. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was agreed to. The question now is on concurring in the Senate in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PADDOCK.* Would it be in order to offer a substitute for section 2? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not until the amendments perfecting the text have been acted on.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to make an inquiry in reference to the amendment proposed by the committee striking out in the second section the

Without the written consent of the officer or agent having charge thereof.

I am not familiar with these reservations, but it seems to me that it I am not familiar with these reservations, but it seems to me that it should not be a crime for a person to cut some grass or cut a stick of timber with the consent of the agent or officer in charge of the reservation. It would seem to be proper that some one should have authority to grant that permission, but there may be some reason to the contrary which I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator desires, he can have that amendment excepted from the general vote of concurrence, and then the Senate may not concur in that amendment, or he can offer an amendment to it.

Mr. CONKLING. My colleague, I apprehend, on reflection, will agree with the committee in this regard. If he takes the case he puts of allowing a single stick of timber to be cut, or some innocent accomor allowing a single stack of timber to be cut, or some innocent accommodation to take place, we can all agree that there may be no danger in committing that to the discretion of somebody; but he will see, as experience has shown, that such a power as this, the power given to somebody to consent not merely in the case he states but generally in such cases, and in other cases however enlarged, opens a door for connivance, for fraud, for evil opportunities, for those occasions which grow into complaints and serious complaints on the borders between the Indians and the settlers, between the Indians and intruders, poachers, marauders, and those whose rights the Government is not seeking to protect. Looking to this the committee thought it was a much more prudent thing to say "taste not, touch not, handle not; let these people alone; avoid all contrivances and opportunities either to commit frauds upon them or to create irritations which may grow into difficulties and collisions and troubles of a larger kind." I say this only by way of suggestion, not meaning to argue it, and I think my colleague will see the force of abstinence further than is here proposed.

Mr. KERNAN. May the Indians themselves in any way authorize anybody to enter on the reservation? They cannot, as I understand. I did not know but that there was some officer that could allow entries to be made in these small ways.

Mr. CONKLING. In theory no doubt my colleague is quite right. In theory there is some officer to whom you can confide this, but not practically. Which officer is it? Somebody has said that the best of all governments would be an absolute despotism if you could have a perfectly wise and perfectly pure despot; but the difficulty is to find him; and so the difficulty is to find an Indian agent or somebody else who will wisely, discreetly, judiciously, and unexceptionally pass upon such questions committed to his discretion. For fear that such people were not to be found, the committee thought that we had better ple were not to be found, the committee thought that we had better mot intrust this discretion.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he does not think that it would be safe and proper to lodge the discretion with not trimk that it would be sale and proper to longe the discretion with the President, or the Secretary of the Interior, to issue an order granting these rights where necessary? It often happens that parties are on a reservation by consent of the Secretary of the Interior or by the consent of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I propose to offer a substitute for the section declaring that the President may permit persons to go on the reservation and take those things which may be absolutely precessary in certain existences.

Mr. CONKLING. This suggestion occurs to me on the threshold:

It is not the purpose of this act to revise or overset what may be the law or the usage in that regard now. It is an act to inhibit certain things and restrain them. The idea suggested by the Senator belongs, it seems to me, to the residue of legislation on this subject. If this act contains a restriction of some particular thing which the Senator this act contains a restriction of some particular thing which the Senator thinks would be wise, then I can see why he might want to amend it; if it does, and his amendment shall consist in committing to the President or Secretary of the Interior the power which was, before the amendment made by the committee interposed, committed to the agent, it seems to me that that would be to leave the difficulty substantially as it is, because you would only commit the power to a higher hand to be exercised on the suggestion and recommendation made by and the information given by this same person. We all know that the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior cannot look abroad from Washington and spy out with his own eyes on an Indian reservation, and understand of his own knowledge in respect of an Indian reservation, whether a proposal to cut timber or to do something of that sort in a small way might or might not be wise. They must have some mode of acquiring that information. The mode, as a matter of course, is to receive information from the very person nominated in the bill before it was amended, as the repository of this discretion. So the change would be merely modal, merely in form, requiring the act to be by another person which act must all the time practically be predicated of the judgment and action of the subordinate officer on the spot. As I say, I think the Senator had better leave it to go and to be dealt with, if it shall be found too rigorous, in such general legislation as concerns the administration of Indian reservations, than attempt on this special bill inhibiting certain specific things, to deal with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York [Mr. Kernan] desire the amendment he indicated to be specially re-

Mr. KERNAN. No, sir; but I have an amendment to offer to the third section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order after the amendment of the Committee of the Whole shall have been acted upon. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee to the third section. I wish to strike out the whole of line 9 and the words "the reserve" in line 10, and insert "the order of the President of the United States;" so that the section shall read:

And who shall refuse or neglect to remove therefrom upon the order of the President of the United States.

Under this section as it now stands it will be observed that any agent may order persons from these reservations. It seems to me that order should come from a higher authority and should come really from the President himself, of course acting through the Secretary of

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe to the Senator that he proposes to amend what has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole. Therefore his opportunity of amending it will be on the question of concurring in the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I did not know that that had been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the first section by striking out in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not until the committee's amendments have been acted upon.

Mr. WINDOM. Will it be in order at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will then be. To facilitate busi-

The FRESIDENT protempore. It will then be. To facilitate business the Chair will take up the amendments seriatim for concurrence. The first amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in lines 10 and 11 of section 1, after the word "law" and before the word "treaty" to insert "or;" and after the word "stipulation," in the same line, to strike out "or executive order."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in section 2, line 4, after the word "law" and before the word "treaty," to insert the word "or;" and in lines 5 and 6 to strike out "executive order without the written consent of the officer or agent having charge thereof."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to permit the cutting of such timber or grass, or the use of such stone as may be necessary for the purposes of the  $\Delta$ rmy or for the use of the several agencies located on any such reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the words "or other materials" should be inserted after "stone." I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in. Mr. PADDOCK. I offer an amendment to section 2 as a substitute

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a desire on the part of the Senate to amend section 2 before the substitute is offered? If not the substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. PADDOCK, as

That the President, by executive order, may prohibitall persons not Indians from cutting or removing or in any way carrying away any wood, trees, or timber of any kind, or stone, or any other material from an Indian reservation established by law or treaty. Any person who violates such order shall be liable to a fine, on conviction, of not less than $100 nor more than $500, and imprisonment not exceeding two

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to ask the Senator who offers this substitute in what respect it differs from the original section?

Mr. PADDOCK. It differs in this respect: It gives to the President the authority in special cases, by executive order, to authorize or to prohibit what is here provided for.

Mr. INGALLS. In that case the substitute is based upon what I conceive to be an entire misapprehension of the present condition of the law with regard to Indian reservations. The theory of reservations for the purposes of occupation by Indians is that, while the fee to the land remains in the Government, the right to the exclusive use and occupation of the land is conceded to the Indians, and so far as I am acquainted with legislation upon this subject, every statute and every treaty contains express provisions that the Indians shall be protected in such exclusive use and occupation. It is therefore now the law, without the intervention of any order from the President, that no person shall have the right to remove from any Indian reservation grass, timber, and stone for any purpose whatever. So then the purpose of this section being to apply a penal sanction for the violation of this law, the object of the Senator from Nebraska in offering his amendment, as I said before, is based upon misapprehension, because this prohibition already exists and it is not necessary to invoke the intervention of the President for this purpose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If this amendment were put in, would it not imply that the President might make such orders and give such permission?

Mr. INGALLS. It would not only imply that, but in my opinion it would amount to a revocation of the present restriction that exists, and would imply that in the absence of a presidential order forbidand would imply that in the absence of a presidential order for adding the trespass or the invasion of these reservations persons would be permitted to take off wood, timber, stone, grass, and other materials. I think, therefore, that the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is liable at least to be very pernicious and open to very serious objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWE. I think one moment's reflection will satisfy the Senator from Nebraska that he does not want to press this amendment. If it should be adopted, he would make it a penal offense to disregard an executive order. It would not be unlawful to cut timber or to remove minerals from Indian reservations unless the President by executive order said it should be unlawful; and then the penalty would be attached, not to a violation of the law of the land, but to the violation of a proclamation of the President, or rather of an order of the President. It would be a new sort of legislation to undertake to do that. I think the Senator will agree with me that before you can punish a citizen or ought to punish a citizen for doing a thing the law ought to tell him not to do it, and that law ought not to emanate from the executive department of the Government, but ought to be written in the statutes, not evidenced by executive order.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does not the section as I propose to amend it instruct the citizen not to do it, with this exception only, that he may have the right given to him by an order expressly from the President? It is simply an exception. The exception is through the order of the President only.

Mr. HOWE. The section, as I understand it, reads different from that. If the Senator means to vest in the President the authority to

Mr. PADDOCK. In special cases. That is exactly the scope of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. HOWE. That is a very different question; but I do not know why we should authorize the President to permit the Senator from Nebraska or myself to take timber from Indian lands any more than to take it from each other's lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. There are some reservations which are only technically reservations, and upon which it is best for the Indians and for the Government and for the citizens adjacent thereto that parties should have the right to go in special cases, and take grass and stone, &c. The authority may safely be lodged with the President. If he is satisfied on examination that it is best to give that privilege, I think it would be well to let him do so, rather than to preclude him from all authority under the law to give permission under any state of circumstances that could exist.

Moreover, there is an anomalous condition of affairs in the district of country known as the Black Hills. Some thousands of people are there, and they are there by a sort of tacit permission of the Government; they are there to develop the great mining interests which are supposed to be there. Under the original section as it stands it would be utterly impossible for any one of those people to remain there for The actual fact is that there are some reservations, which are only technically so, from which the Indians have gone temporarily, and where people in the neighborhood ought to have a right to go for the protection of property there and for other reasons. It seems to me it would be well to leave to the President the authority in such cases to say that they might under such circumstances remain there and do these things.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to remark that if there are reservations which are only technical, this act will not apply to those. This act applies only to reservations which are created by law.

Mr.PADDOCK. That is exactly what I mean. I am speaking of such reservations where the Indians do not happen to be at the time. They are technically reservations, but they do not happen for a space of time to be occupied by the Indians to whom the reservations belong. Mr. INGALLS. The language of the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska is-

That the President by executive order may prohibit all persons not Indians from cutting or removing or in any way carrying away any wood, trees, or timber of any kind, or stone or other materials, from an Indian reservation established by law or

The necessary implication carried by this language is that, in the absence of a positive prohibition by the President, through an order issued for that purpose, persons not Indians have a right to occupy the reservations and remove and carry away timber, stone, and other material from Indian reservations. I am confident that such is not the Senator's design, but I am equally confident that such will be the practical operation of this substitute, if it shall be adopted.

Mr. HARVEY, I design in this connection to call the attention of

Mr. HARVEY. I desire in this connection to call the attention of my colleague and of the Senate to the fact that there are in some of the States and Territories technical Indian reservations; reservations that have been occupied by the Indians, and from which the Indians have been removed to the Indian Territory and elsewhere, and the ground has then been occupied by settlers who have gone there by the countenance or recognition of the Interior Department; and yet it is held by some that the ground occupied by them would be included in what would be regarded as an Indian reservation. If so, the pro-visions of this second section would render those settlers subject to a penalty for cutting the timber that might be necessary for fire-wood, or the grass necessary to make hay for their stock. If such a construction can be put on the section, there certainly ought to be some amendment adopted which would remove that objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not regard this section as being at all open to the objection urged by my colleague. If there are any technical Indian reservations to which the title has been extinguished by treaty and the tribe have been removed to other localities, and in pursuance of the treaty settlers have gone upon the lands and are occupying them with the consent of the Government and of the Indians themselves, there certainly could be neither actual nor technical trespass for any act they might perform on land to which they had an equita-ble if not a legal title.

Mr. WINDOM. I am not quite sure that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska accomplishes exactly what I desire; but I think the second section of this bill is pernicious, and that it ought to be amended or stricken from the bill. I do not see the necessity for such a provision. I can see that in a certain case it will work very great hardship and injury. I allude to the Black Hills reserva-tion. The history of the effort last summer to treat with the Indians with reference to that reservation is well known. It is also well understood that there are from twelve hundred to two thousand people derstood that there are from twelve hundred to two thousand people now in the Black Hills mining; and I believe that the reports as to the abundance of gold in that region are well founded. I cannot see any pressing necessity which requires the Senate at this time to adopt a provision that will compel those people to leave that reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have they any right there now?

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Vermont asks if they have any right there now.

right there now. Technically perhaps no; but, when the treaty was made with those Indians, there were certain stipulations on their part and certain agreements on ours. One of the conditions of that treaty and certain agreements on ours. One of the conditions of that treaty was that we should pay to 'the Sioux Indians a certain amount of money for four years, I think from the date of the treaty, which should enable them to become self-sustaining, and not dependent upon the Government. Now, sir, what have we done? Faithfully complied with the treaty during the four years, paying them large sums of money, amounting to from $1,200,000 to $1,500,000 per amoun; and at the evel of the four years the alternative was presented to the countries. the end of the four years the alternative was presented to the country, "continue to vote a million and a quarter of dollars per annum to these Indians, or war." For two or three years since the expiration try, "continue to vote a million and a quarter of dollars per annum to these Indians, or war." For two or three years since the expiration of the term of four years for which we were to make these payments, Congress has appropriated from $1,200,000 to $1,400,000 in order to prevent an outbreak on the part of these Indians. We have paid it without any requirement of a treaty, but simply, as I said a moment ago, as the alternative of peace or war. I myself, having had charge of the Indian appropriation bill for two or three years have urged at every session of Congress that we should make these appropriations as the cheapest means of dealing with the Indians. In other words, that it was cheaper to feed than to fight them. We were under no obligations to do it.

Last summer when the Government sent a commission to the Indian territory for the purpose of treating with them—buying the right to mine in those lands—we all know, from public report, how that commission was received; and we all congratulate ourselves that our honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. Allison,] the chairman of the committee, came back here with his scalp on his head, instead of having it grace some war-dance out on the Missouri River.

Sir, I claim that the Indians have not themselves complied with that treaty; that here is a rich country, full of mineral, into which our people have gone recently by the facit consent, I believe, of the Government. Failing to make a new treaty with the Indians, there has been no effort the last few months to keep white people from that territory, and I think there ought not to be any such effort. We propose now by this bill to say to those people who have thus gone there and taken possession of a rich country after the treaty had been violated by the Indians themselves: "If you take any material whatever; if you cut down a tree, or take any grass, or even dig gold from the hills, you shall be punished with $500 fine and imprisonment for two years."

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what respects have the Indians violated the

Mr. WINDOM. The Indians have violated the treaty by refusing to maintain themselves and demanding that we shall maintain them or they will fight; and we all know that has been the condition presented to us; we all know that we have reluctantly voted a million and a quarto us, we all know that we have reliectably voted a minon and a duarter of dollars every year in order to prevent their fighting. We have paid them much more than the original treaty required for these lands; and I claim that we have a perfect right, in conscience and in law, to say that the people of the United States shall take possession of these lands for mining purposes. Gold is not so plenty in this country at the present time that we should refuse to open up a rich mining region guide as this promises to be mining region such as this promises to be.

If there is no other necessity than that which exists in the Black Hills for the passage of a law such as this, I say it had far better go over. If an exception can be made of that reservation I am not aware of any great injury that will be done by the bill, nor am I aware of any great benefit that it will accomplish. I do not know that I shall think another can be provided which will perhaps cover the ground that I desire. But I hope that this bill will not be permitted to pass with this section turning out those twelve hundred or two thousand people who have gone there to mine, to furnish gold and silver that will enable us to return to specie payments, or at least help in that direction. I am not in favor of regarding rights which the Indians themselves have violated and turning our people out and denying them the privilege of developing this rich portion of our country. Is an amendment in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WINDOM. I will offer then, at the request of my colleague,

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to that part of the Sioux reservation lying between the north and south forks of the Cheyenne River and east of the east line of Wyoming Territory.

Mr. PADDOCK. As that covers the object I had in view, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I agree fully with the Senator from Minnesota who has just taken his seat [Mr. WINDOM] in regard to the pernicious character of this section; but I do not agree with him that the only bad effect this bill would have in the event of its becoming a law would be to work a hardship on the people in the Black Hills.

Mr. WINDOM. I said I knew of no other.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do know of another instance, and of more than one; and I think if the Judiciary Committee could have known of the cases that I am about to refer to they never would have consented to incorporate this section in this bill. This section provides a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and imprisonment of not exof not less than $100 nor more than $500 and imprisonment of not exceeding two years, against whom and for what? Against any person not an Indian who shall do what? Who "shall cut or remove"—not cut and remove—"or in any manner carry away any wood, trees, or timber of any kind, or stone, grass, or any other material from an Indian reservation established by law or treaty stipulation within the limits of any State or Territory of the United States."

That is the previous and provide the United States."

That is the provision. An amendment was adopted while the Senate was in Committee of the Whole, upon the motion of the Senator from Iowa, to the effect that it should not apply in case of the Army, in the case of any necessary materials used for the Army, or in case of any necessary materials used for the benefit of the agency on the respective of the inthe provision of the second of the sec ervation. So that is the precise status now, as I understand it, of the

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a case where I think and where I believe the Senate will think when they understand the and where I believe the Senate will think when they understand the case that this section would work a very great hardship, to say the least. On the North Pacific coast we are not accommodated as the people of the East are generally with railroads. Our people have not the facilities of railroad transportation there that they have generally in the East. There is in Eastern Oregon a reservation known as the Umatilla reservation. It is a reservation established not by executive order but by solemn treaty between the Indians and the Government of the United States. It is an immense reservation. It is over fifty miles in width, and I do not know how many miles in length fifty miles in width, and I do not know how many miles in length, but still longer. That reservation lies directly across the emigrant road that passes from the great overland road to Oregon and to Washington Territory. Over that emigrant road four-fifths I presume of all the present adult population of Oregon and Washington Territory. tory have passed in going to that country. In fact the only way to go to that country really is by land transportation. That road is known as the old emigrant road. It is marked by the graves and the bones of emigrants who have passed over it.

There is one matter in connection with this to which I wish to refer. Settlements have been established in Eastern Oregon and in Washington Territory in different directions from this reservation. For instance, there is a large settlement in the Grand Round Valley. There is the town of La Grande, with a population of a thousand or probably fifteen hundred people. There is another town—Union—a large town surrounded by a large settlement. There is another, the town of Weston. There are towns scattered all over that territory of Eastern Oregon. Where do these towns get their flour and all their supplies? How do they get them? They cannot get them by railroad, because there is no railroad there. The only way they can get supplies is by virtue of the old prairie schooner, by four-horse and six-horse wagons, by teams. These supplies come from Portland, from the Columbia River. They of necessity pass over this reservation. There is no other way, because the reservation spreads its broad from the Columbia River. They of necessity pass over this reserva-tion. There is no other way, because the reservation spreads its broad acres all across that country. You cannot go around it, because it extends from the mountains to the river. There is a road there, and it has been there for years. It is known, as I say, as the old emigrant road. These prairie schooners, these teams, average, at the very most, not more than twenty miles a day in transporting their tons of freight across this pioneer country. They must stop at night, they must camp, they must have grass for their horses, for their mules, for their ox teams. They have stopped from time immemorial right on this reservation. They must do it now. But if this bill becomes a law with this section in it, then they cannot do it unless they become criminals

There is not a man engaged in the transportation of freight in that country to-day—and there are hundreds of them engaged in that busibut ex necessitate rei would become a criminal under the provisions of this section, because under this section if any man not an Indian, I do not care how innocent he may be, traveling along that road, I care not what business he may be engaged in, how free he may be from any disposition to interfere with the Indians or with their rights, cuts any grass or any wood, if he happen to break down his team for instance in passing along, as he frequently does, as I have seen him myself on this very road during the last summer, if he cuts a stick of timber, he becomes a trespasser. Now, it will be said that nobody would interfere in a case of that kind, that a thing of that kind would be overlooked. There are always enough of busybodies and intermeddlers in every country ready and willing to make complaint against any man who is found even technically, or innocently it may be, violating the law.

That is the exact state of the case with reference to the State which

I have the honor in part to represent here. As I say, you cannot get around this reservation. The road is there; it is traveled, it is lined to-day with emigrant teams going to that country. You cannot cross it in a day. You cannot cross it in two days. Therefore I object to

Mr. WEST. Nor is that the only case.
Mr. MITCHELL. And I have no doubt, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, that there are other cases of the same character.
Why pass a law of that kind? Wherefore the necessity of a law that will manifestly work a hardship of this kind? Then the third section goes on and provides:

There is not so much objection to that provision. I might be willing to vote for the bill, if the second section were stricken out or so amended as not to operate in the manner in which I have suggested. I am satisfied, as I said in the outset, that if the Judiciary Committee could travel as I have traveled over that immense country time and time again and see and know for themselves the situation of that people, the hardships that they have to endure in transporting their freight from the point of supply to the point of distribution and demand, they would be slow to make the recommendation that they make in the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have no particular interest in the second section, but I cannot help feeling a little interest in the debate. which it has elicited. The second section renews a command which which it has elicited. The second section renews a command which the law has long uttered—a command which I always supposed was very simple, and I always supposed it was very honest, which simply says to you, and me, and all of us, "Let Indian property alone." "Thou shalt not steal Indian property." I thank my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for the suggestion. That is all it says; and it proposes to annex some penalties to the violation of this command. "You shall not steal Indian property;" that is all. "If you do, you shall pay a fine." I would not have supposed that in the Senate of the United States a proposition of that sort could have arroyed as much

United States a proposition of that sort could have aroused as much interest and elicited as much debate as this has.

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. Paddock] is alarmed for the fate of those enterprising gentleman who are now pouring into the Sioux reservation in Western Dakota. I have seen that reservation, or rather I have been as near to the reservation as I cared to go. I know where it is. That reservation and the Indians upon it occupy peculiar relations to us undoubtedly. I think myself that reservation is a proper, legitimate subject for legislation; butyou should take that subject up legitimate subject for legislation; but you should take that subject up by itself; your law should prescribe what may or may not be done by the people of the United States in reference to that reservation. I am not in favor of the proposition of my friend from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] I cannot vote for a proposition which simply reserves or excepts that particular reservation from the operations of this bill. I think it ought to be exempted from the operations of this bill, but then I think you ought to do more than that. Before you except it from the operations of this bill I think you ought to prescribe by law just what may be done with reference to that tract of territory. My friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] is frightened from another quarter. He knows of an Indian reservation which has to be traversed by emigrants, and they have to cut grass and take fuel to build their fires as they camp by night, and he is afraid they will be subject to the penalties of this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if that as a matter of fact would not be the result?

Mr. HOWE. Literally, yes.

Mr. HOWE. Literally, yes.
Mr. MITCHELL. So I thought.
Mr. HOWE. I suppose it would, but the Senator knows perfectly well it is not within the purpose of the bill. He knows that there is not a tract of country, not a foot of country, not a farm anywhere in the United States, owned by an Indian or a white man, from which grass or timber cannot be taken and is not taken habitually for the purpose of baiting your horse where you are overtaken by night or building a camp-fire to go to sleep by. The law is never enforced in such a case. You do not enforce the law though it protects your property. The Senator from Oregon does not complain of such trespasses, although Senator from Oregon does not complain of such trespasses, although they are made on his property. You traverse immense tracts of the public domain not owned by Indians and you take timber and grass from those lands under just such conditions, for just such purposes, and nobody is ever interfered with for doing it. But what is the conclusion? I think, in spite of these inconveniences, it is a little wrong to steal from Indian lands. Is it, or is it not? Shall we say that it will not do for us to annex a penalty to the stealing from Indian lands. Indian lands simply because somebody is going to be incommoded by it?

Mr. PADDOCK. If a penalty is to be imposed upon white men for stealing from Indians, a corresponding penalty should be imposed upon Indians for stealing from white men. Some millions of dollars of property in my State have been stolen by Indians.

Mr. HOWE. O, that is a brand-new difficulty. I had not heard of that before. The point is that you want to legalize stealing from Indians in order to have a set-off against some trespasses that they have committed! Is that it? Then say so. Bring in the law and have it supported. I do not know the particular facts. We do not allow the Indians to steal from us. All the laws you have on your books which restrain my friend from Nebraska and myself from stealing you have to restrain the Indians and I respect they are enforced. books which restrain my friend from Nebraska and myself from stealing you have to restrain the Indians, and I suspect they are enforced quite as rigidly against Indians as they are against any of us. We are brought face to face, then, with the question whether we will legalize the plunder from Indians or prohibit it; and if we prohibit it, whether we will punish it if done in spite of our prohibition.

So far as the Indians are concerned, I confess I am not very anxious whether this second section is agreed to enter the test of the characteristics.

whether this second section is agreed to or not; but so far as the character of the Senate is concerned, I would a great deal rather the Senate would not strike out the section. I think that would not look quite well. I would rather have one of my speeches reported just as I made it, with all the blunders in it; and I cannot think of any more severe penalty for any offense than that would be than standing in the pillory; and I would rather have that penalty enforced on me than have my vote go on your Journals in favor of striking out this second

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, as I am to vote upon this bill, I should like to know the points on which it is based for the judgment of the Senate. I always listen to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] with very great pleasure. I observe the logic that generally accompanies whatever he may have to say. But he stated a while ago the principle on which he based his amendment and its equities, that I desire to notice for a moment. I understand from him that we have made in times past (and I believe the record shows that he is correct in that statement) a treaty with the Sioux Indians, and that we have faithfully complied with that treaty, but the Sioux Indians have not complied with that fidelity which we might look for from the red man, and they have in truth and in fact menaced Congress with a demand of a million and a quarter dollars a year, and if that we not not well we not so that the treather we have the first that the congress with a demand of a million and a quarter dollars a year, and if that was not paid we should have to fight; that Congress—whether wisely or not the Senator did not say—had accepted the challenge and had concluded that it was cheaper to pay a million and a quarter dollars than to fight, and that we did pay it under the demand of the Sioux tribe of Indians; and now by way of retaliation, by way of getting even, we propose to allow whoever may see proper of our American citizens to go upon the Indian reservation and take timber and grass, and that twelve or fifteen hundred of our good citizens may take such gold as may be found in the Indian reservation, and that the Indians shall have no remedy against these intruders, if intruders they be, against these invaders, if invaders they be, which I do not charge at all. It does seem to me that if we desire any retaliation or any rebate or drawbacks on Indians, this is not exactly the way to do it.

I submit to my friend the remarks I have made. My judgment in-clines to the idea that he does not base his demand for the support of this amendment upon the true principles of logic and justice.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I am sure that I have said nothing about retaliating upon the Indians; and, so far as the lecture of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] upon the morality of stealing from Indians is concerned, I think it does not apply to those who advocate the amendment I propose. I put my objection to this second section of the bill upon the ground that we are not under any obligation to carry out the Sioux treaty as made in 1868, for the reason that the Indians themselves had violated it and that it was a question to us, addressed to our discretion, as to how we would legislate upon it. I put it also upon the other ground, that we had been compelled to pay them some three or four million dollars within the last three years more than we had stipulated to pay them, in order to preserve the peace which they by treaty had agreed to preserve without that the peace which they by treaty had agreed to preserve interest additional payment.

Now, I put it to my honorable friend from Mississippi [Mr. Alcorn] and also from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] whether, if in the case I have mentioned, where we had agreed to pay them a stipulated amount, and they had agreed to keep the peace, and they have not kept the peace, and, by reason of their outbreaks, their attacks upon the whites, their attacks upon the whites. their violations of the treaty, we have since paid three or four million dollars, we are compelled still to say that that treaty stands, and shall be kept inviolate? I do not believe a word of it; and hence

I say, when you talk of prohibiting men from going upon that territory, taking gold and silver from it, you do not propose to legalize stealing if you allow those men to go there. They have the right to go there, and we have no right, I believe, to prohibit their going there There is no stealing about it.

If I were standing here to-day advocating an appropriation under this Indian treaty, I apprehend that my honorable friend from Mis-sissippi would be just as eloquent as he is now in insisting that there was nothing binding in an Indian treaty; that we had a right to do just as we pleased about it. I do not know what his sentiments are, but I know we very often encounter such views when we seek to carry out treaties that have not been violated by the Indians. Now carry out treaties that have not been violated by the Indians. Now when we come here with a treaty that has been violated, that is not binding on the United States, and seek to protect twelve hundred American citizens who have gone there to develop the resources of this country, we are told that they are thieves and that they have gone into that territory to steal. The Government of the United States has permitted them to go there. There has been no effort for the last two months to keep them out of that territory. It is true that last summer they were forbidden, and we sought to make a treaty with the Siony Indians by which we could account the right to perthat last summer they were forbidden, and we sought to make a treaty with the Sioux Indians by which we could acquire the right to permit them to go without a war with those Indians. We preferred to treat with them rather than fight them. We have preferred for two or three years past to pay them a million and a quarter a year rather than fight them. The Indians will not treat; they are determined to fight, determined to insist that you shall pay them this large sum of more years and for one so far as my vote goes. I am preceived that the money; and, for one, so far as my vote goes, I am resolved that the people of the United States shall have the opportunity to go there and develop the whole of the United States; and I say that no treaty stands in the way.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] asked me, when I was on my feet before, wherein they had violated it. I will refer him to two more instances in which they have violated it. One clause in the treaty provided that the Indians "will not attack any person at home, or traveling, nor molest or disturb any wagon trains, coaches, mules, or cattle belonging to the people of the United States, or to persons friendly therewith;" and again, "that they will never kill or scalp white men, nor attempt to do them harm." We have half a dozen instances in which these Indians have violated the treaty in that regard. When a small portion of the Army of the United States crossed the territory north of their reservation two or three years ago they had two or three battles with the Indians. The Indians attacked them two or three battles with the Indians. The Indians attacked them in violation of the treaty; and when, too, the United States was simply carrying out a right that it had under the treaty to survey for railroads. So, then, there is nothing binding there, I insist, upon us; and it would be simply an act of gross injustice and wrong to compel those people who have gone there by the tacit consent of the Government to take possession of the land, where the treaty itself is violated by the Indians, to drive them out under this bill. I hope it will not pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota what was the railway survey, protected by a Government escort, that was attacked by the Indians?

Mr. WINDOM. The North Pacific survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far is the North Pacific road from this Black Hill reservation?

Hill reservation ?

Mr. WINDOM. The North Pacific road runs on the parallel of 47°, I think. I know it does in Minnesota and Dakota, and I think it continues due west on that line.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the northern boundary of this reservation?
Mr. WINDOM. The forty-sixth degree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. About seventy miles south of the railroad line?

Mr. EDMUNDS. About seventy miles south of the railroad line?
Mr. WINDOM. The surveying party was attacked when outside of the reservation by the Indians.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose that was so, does that authorize any citizen of the United States, at his own free will and without any action of the Government, to take possession of this Indian territory and kill all the Indians in it, and take the gold, and carry off the timber?

My friend does not pretend that.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not insist on any such thing, but I insist that when a treaty is violated on one side it is not binding on the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is certainly very extraordinary doctrine in international law, that because one nation violates a treaty with an-international law, that because one nation violates a treaty with another nation, without any action of that other nation in its collective capacity each one of its citizens according to his own free will may make war upon the nation that is said to have violated the treaty.

Mr. WINDOM. I have made no such construction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what it amounts to. My honorable friend says, if I correctly understand him—and if I do not he certainly will correct me—that he holds the entry of these white people into this reservation and digging for gold, &c., and their establishing themselves there, is not a violation of this treaty; that they had a legal right to do it. His reason, if I correctly understand him, is that the treaty is abrogated—is abrogated— Mr. WINDOM. Mr. WINDOM. I say they went there with the tacit consent of the Government, which was one of the parties to this treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does "the tacit consent of the Government" mean? Will the honorable Senator tell us?

Mr. WINDOM. It means that the Government knew these people were going there and did nothing to prevent them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is "tacit consent," is it?

Mr. WINDOM. That is what I meant by "tacit consent."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then this Government is more responsible for the action of its citizens than, on any principle that I am acquainted with, other governments are. We know that every day people are leaving this country on every side who ought not to be allowed to leave it—forgers, criminals of all sorts. The United States does nothing to prevent it in most instances; and so it is to be said that these refugees from justice reach other shores with the tacit consent of the United States. To borrow an expression that I believe my colleague complained of this morning, which is usual to the Senator from Ohio, "that won't do."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Therefore, Mr. President, that won't

do. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Therefore that won't do; it won't do at all."

Mr. President, if we are obliged to resort to this species of sophistry—my friend will pardon me if I style it "sophistry;" it is with no offensive designation to himself-if we are obliged to resort to this species of sophistry to delude ourselves into the idea that we can upspecies of sophistry to defide ourserves into the lace that we can appear to hold, in a public, and honest, and moral sense, to say nothing of the law, this invasion of this Indian territory by these white gold-hunters, I shall be very sorry indeed. These people did not go there with any consent of the United States at all. According to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and according to what I believe was notorious at the time, it appears that every effort was made by the United States to prevent this invasion of this territory by these various white persons. I read from the very last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on this subject:

Meanwhile

Speaking of the negotiations going on under the charge of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON]——

Meanwhile, notwithstanding the stringent prohibitory orders by the military authorities and in the face of the large military force which has been on duty in and around the hills during the summer, probably not less than a thousand miners, with the number rapidly increasing, have made their way into the Sioux country.

These military authorities were acting under the orders, I must assume, of the President of the United States, who is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and yet when the whole available force of the Government, as it is officially reported to us, had been brought to bear to repress and prevent this invasion, my honorable friend says that is "tacit consent."

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I said in my remarks that during the last two or three months there had been no effort; I said also distinctly that last summer there was an effort to prevent it.

While on my feet I wish to ask the Senator whether, if this treaty had been violated and these men went there, it is our duty to punish them for going? That is the point that I made. It was not a point as to whether these people had violated the treaty or not; but is it our duty now to pass a penal statute to punish them for going there, to take that affirmative action?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, it is not our duty to pass a penal statute to punish anybody for something that he has already done. have a strong impression, although I am not very familiar with the Constitution, that there is a provision against it in the Constitution. Therefore this act is not to punish anybody for what he has already done. It is to punish persons who in violation of law and of the rights of others, although they do not happen to be civilized men, but men nevertheless, invade that small portion of the surface of the earth hevertheless, invade that small portion of the surface of the earth that the Government has set apart and pledged that they shall have exclusively, for the mere purposes of private gain and without any authority from the Government at all. That is the object of this bill. Now, if we can bring ourselves to say in set phrase—because euphemisms do not help it much—that the Indian, either with a treaty or without a treaty, wherever he is, is a pure outlaw, who on the strictest principle of ancient barbaric laws against outlaws may be slain or described by any reconstruction. despoiled by any man who meets him, then the entry of these white men into the Black Hills may be justified upon that ground. If, on the other hand, you regard, as I believe my honorable friend from Minnesota regards, the members of these Indian tribes, bad as they are, as still human beings living in this country entitled to have by occupancy, or whatever you call it, a place to stand as long as they live and to sleep and to dwell and a place to be buried in when they live and to sleep and to dwell and a place to be buried in when they die, and that meantime they are entitled to the protection of this Government in whatever rights the Government has solemnly conceded to them, then we are bound by every principle of honor as well as every principle of public consideration, leading our own people to respect laws and to obey them wherever they are, to make fair and just laws to punish the invasion of these rights. I think that is a proposition to which my friend from Minnesota will agree in the abstract. Perhaps he will not agree to the application of it to any possible case that can be named. I do not know how that is.

Mr. President, let me proceed a little further with the history of these Black Hills, and see whether the executive department of the these Black Hills, and see whether the executive department of the United States regards the Indians as having violated this treaty which my honorable friend chooses to have set aside on the say-so of Tom, Dick, and Harry, who want gold, instead of the say-so of the Government of the United States. I read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

In this serious complication there seems to be but one alternative for the Government: either to so increase the military force and adopt such summary means as will insure a strict observance of the treaty rights of the Sioux by preventing ali intrusion, or to renew the effort of negotiation. However unwilling we may be to confess it, the experience of the past summer proves either the inefficiency of the large military force under the command of such officers as Generals Sheridan, Terry, and Crook, or the utter impracticability of keeping Americans out of a country where gold is known to exist by any fear of orders, or of United States cavalry, or by any consideration of the rights of others.

This is the class of people, according to this description of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who my honorable friend is so afraid may find it inconvenient to prosecute their invasion of the Indian territory any further if we pass this law. Why, sir, this report, instead of complaining that the Indians have violated this treaty, complains in the most vigorous and manly way, I am bound to say, against this lawless invasion (contrary to the laws of the United States and contrary to the faith that we have pledged to the Indians for exclusive occupancy of that territory) by people whose only motive is, not to vindicate the rights of the United States under a treaty that the Indians have broken, but the thirst for gold, the thirst for adventure, that restless spirit which carries the great body of those people who are known as miners from one mining place to another wherever the news comes, however well or ill supported by the facts, that fresh gold-fields have been found.

We are brought face to face with the proposition, and ought to decide it one way or the other so that all the people will know what regard we have for our treaty obligations and our Government obligations, either that we will consent to see our own laws and regulations violated without providing any punishment, or that we will provide proper punishment for violations of law although those violations of law may occur in the case of an Indian as well as a white man. I do not hold that it is any part of the individual rights of any citizen of the United States or any body of the citizens of the United States to take the execution of treaties into their own hands, or to take the punishment or retaliation for the violation of treaties into their own hands. They are bound to obey the of treaties into their own hands. They are bound to obey the law; and they had no more right to go there on the ground that the treaty had been violated, than they would have bad a right to go there if there was not any pretense by them or by anybody else that the treaty had been violated. If this is a government of laws at all, then it is not the business of every man to decide for himself whether some other nation or some other State has broken a statute, and he is to take vengeance into his own hands; and that is what these people have done on my friend's theory; but on the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who has officially investigated and reported upon the subject, we have the ground of this invasion stated to be the thirst for gold, that each individual wishes to get it for himself. He then goes on to say: self. He then goes on to say:

self. He then goes on to say:

The occupation and possession of the Black Hills by white men seems now inevitable, but no reason exists for making this inevitability an occasion of wrong or lasting injury to the Sioux. If an Indian can be possessed of rights of country, either natural or acquired, this country belongs for occupation to the Sioux; and if they were an independent, self-supporting people, able to claim that hereafter the United States Government should leave them entirely alone, in yearly receipt of such annuities only as the treaty of 1868 guarantees, they would be in a position to demand to be left in undisturbed possession of their country, and the moral sense of mankind would sustain the demand; but unfortunately the facts are otherwise. They are not now capable of self-support; they are absolute pensioners of the Government in the sum of a million and a quarter of dollars annually above all amounts specified in treaty stipulations. A failure to receive Government rations for a single season would reduce them to starvation. They cannot, therefore, demand to be left alone, and the Government; ranting the large help which the Sioux are obliged to ask, is entitled to ask something of them in return. On this basis of mutual benefit the purchase of the Black Hills should proceed.

Here you have what ampears to me to be a very candid statement of Here you have what appears to me to be a very candid statement of the case, that this invasion of the country of these red men is totally without justification, as sheer a case of lawless violence of the most turbulent kind and of the most selfish kind as ever occurred in the history of a nation. That is what it is; and it is perfectly useless to gloss it over. It is nothing else. And this Commissioner, instead of saying that there was even an excuse for these people going in there on the ground that the Indians are not able to take care of themand I do not think they would be with such a set of visitors instead of even hinting at such an excuse, says in the strongest lan-guage that the whole thing is utterly unjustifiable. Then he says that it is the duty of the Government to take it up and see that justice is done to the Indians, and to come to some basis of mutual benefit by which we can acquire the country honestly, instead of acquiring it by the lawless conquest and violence of our own citizens who not acting under the authority of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, what is the state of our engagements with these Indians? I have before me the treaty of 1868, made after a great deal of trouble, and a great many prior treaties, some of which the Indians had violated and some of which the United States had violated through the agency of its citizens, unpunished for doing it, and made to wind up the whole affair. It is not even ten years old.

It provides that-

If bad men among the whites, or among other people subject to the authority of the United States, shall commit any wrong upon the person or property of the Indians, the United States will, upon proof made to the agent and forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington City, proceed at once to cause the offender to be arrested and punished according to the laws of the United States, and also re-imburse the injured person for the loss sustained.

There is a solemn undertaking by treaty, which it is true does not execute itself, because under it, as it now stands without any legislation, no person can be indicted and punished for violating the treaty by invading the Indian territory. It would be just as wicked, it would be just as lawless; but there being no penal statute to enforce an observance of this treaty, a private person cannot be punished according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. One object ording to the Constitution and laws of the United States. One object of this bill, not applicable to this case alone, but to every case where we have undertaken to protect these people in the special occupancy of a particular reservation, is that we shall so adjust our laws as to be able to hold the sanction of a punishment up to any citizen of the United States who undertakes to do them wrong. Then the treaty proceeds further. After describing this territory, which includes the Black Hills, it proceeds to say that it—

Shall be, and the same is, set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit among them; and the United States now solemnly agrees that no persons except those herein designated and authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents, and employes of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory described in this article, or in such territory as may be added to this reservation for the use of said Indians, and henceforth they will and do hereby relinquish all claims or right in and to any portion of the United States or Territories except such as is embraced within the limits aforesaid and except as hereinafter provided.

So you perceive, Mr. President, that if there is any force in a treaty, which the Constitution of the United States declares to be the supreme law of the land, the faith of the Government, holding to its duty every citizen and every person within its jurisdiction, is solemnly pledged to protect these Indians in the exclusive occupation of this described territory. And therefore, instead of this invasion being justified by an infraction of the treaty which does not exist, instead of this inan infraction of the treaty which does not exist, instead of this invasion being justified upon any principle that can be named, it is in the very face of the solemn pledge of the United States and in violation and contempt of that wholesome authority of law without which no government and no country can long succeed. That is what the state of the case is; and yet Senators get up here and complain that in carrying out the obligations that we have undertaken to carry out by the most solemn of all engagements toward these helpless and troublesome people we are treading on everybody's corns, if I may use an ordinary phrase, this reservation must be excepted, that reservation must be excepted; and that the whole the only object of a reservation must be excepted; and that the whole, the only object of a reserva-tion is to get the Indians on there for the time being, until it is con-venient for the whites, of their own notion, and in spite of treaties, in spite of the law, to take possession and drive them off. I do not think that is right. I do not think that white communities who establish themselves in that way can get on in the long run without having to make compensation for it; I do not mean compensation in gold, but in some way there will be a retribution, as there ought to be if there is any such thing as justice.

This bill which we have brought in, introduced by my honorable friend from Kansas, [Mr. Ingalls,] is in order in a lawful and regular way to hold up to citizens who are lawlessly disposed the sanction of a moderate penalty for a violation of these rights. This is the way to keep the peace. Why, what can these Indians say if we treat them in this manner? They will say, as the report is about these very Indians: "It is no use to make any more treaties; we may as well fight and kill and slay at one time and another as to make treaties; the 'Great Father' will make a treaty with us, and then he will let all his children do everything which the treaty says they shall not do and children do everything which the treaty says they shall not do, and will take no step to prevent it."

Let me give the very words of the Indians themselves as stated in the report of the Indian agent at Standing Rock agency, Dakota Ter-

The expedition to the Black Hills by the military, and subsequent invasion of that country by parties in search of the precious metals, caused much dissatisfaction and bad feeling among the Indians. They emphatically expressed their belief that the Government was triffing with their rights in permitting the treaty to be violated, and asked the pertinent question, "How can the Great Father expect us to observe our obligations under treaty stipulations, when he permits his white children to break it by coming into our country to remain without our consent?" The lawless invasion of the Black Hills by white men, in violation of the intercourse laws of the United States and treaty stipulations with the Indians, and the apparent tardiness or inability of the Government in removing them, caused great distrust and lack of confidence among the Indians toward all white men and the

Mr. President, is that not the natural consequence when you consider the state of the education and the want of civilization of these Indians? What redress have they, according to their traditions, when their dearest rights which we have solemnly pledged ourselves to protect are invaded, and we take no steps and do not pretend to take any steps to punish the violation of them by our citizens? What can they do according to their notions but to break out from their various reservations and get revenge according to their ancient and barbarous customs? That in ninety cases in a hundred, I believe, is what carries desolation along the border, and stirs up these bloody and terrible and horrible conflicts and murders that we hear of every two or three years; and then after all the slaughter, and the misery, and the trouble that is produced, come in the bills which the people, by taxation, are obliged to pay for putting down these Indian outbreaks, or bringing peace through the sword over all these Indians; and the endless amount of expenditure of that kind, if it could be footed up in the Treasury, which has resulted, as I say I believe, in nine cases in ten from the want of consideration on our part of what we cases in ten from the want of consideration on our part of what we had undertaken to do, you would find would be large enough to pay the interest at least of the nationaldebt for a considerable period of time.

So it appears to me, Mr. President,—I may be wrong about it, but I believe it very strongly,—that our first and highest duty is, not only in respect to this particular reservation, which is only one, but in respect to all reservations wherein we have agreed that the Indians shall have special occupation, that we shall by proper penal laws punish our citizens for violating engagements which we have made with the Indians. When we do justice and enforce the law, we shall find, I believe, not only a much greater degree of peace and order in all the borders where these reservations are, but we shall find the Indians growing civilized much faster than we shall by trifling with every engagement we make, and thereby tempting them to relapse into their old habits of revenge and redress

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, my attention has been attracted to this bill within the past few minutes, and of course I have not given it much consideration; but it suggests an old subject with which, heretofore, I have been somewhat familiar. The first with which, heretofore, I have been somewhat familiar. The first section of the bill attracts my attention so strongly to it that I feel constrained to say a word or two in regard to it; and I should hail its passage by the Senate with joy and delight. I should think it would form a new epoch in our history, and that it would lay the foundation of a policy which we might hope in the end would give protection to a class of people hitherto in fact outlawed, although nominally within the protection of the law.

Mr. President, while the existence of these people here antedated the footsteps of any European on this continent, we have treated them as having no rights as against the necessities of the white man. That has been our policy; that has been our gospel; that is our law to-day, and all our policy has been shaped in regard to it. There will not be found upon the statute-books from the beginning down to this not be found upon the statute-books from the beginning down to this hour any law like the one under consideration, which gives the Indian a day in court for protection against crimes committed upon him. Now, for the first time in our history, my honorable friend from Kansas who sits near me [Mr. Ingalls] has the enviable distinction of proposing that the jurisdiction of the laws shall be extinction of proposing that the jurisdiction of the laws shall be extended over the Indian, to the end that he shall have a remedy for crimes committed against his person or his property.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not like to interrupt my friend, but I think if he will turn to the Revised Statutes, section 2145, he will find a law almost in the exact language of this first section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend will have an opportunity to correct me if I am wrong. I think I am acquainted with that section of the Revised Statutes, and he will find that that proposition does not cover this ground.

I was about to remark that we have come so very near this thing oftentimes that a great many people believe that we have really intended by our statutes to protect the Indian, and so Congress would seem to have legislated. Whoever looks at the legislation of 1835 with regard to the government of the Indian Territory will see that rules and regulations as rigid quite as these were attempted to be enforced there, were provided; but how were they to be carried out? They were never given over to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. My honorable friend will find in the portion of the Revised Statutes to which he refers, I dare say, a provision that any trespasser upon an Indian reservation or in the Indian country might be removed. It was made the duty of the Indian agent to remove him, and if he resisted it was the duty of the President of the United States and if he resisted it was the duty of the Fresident of the United States to remove him by military force. But that is not the point at all. The question is to give the Indian a day in court, so that he may enforce his remedies for injuries done against him and his property, by proper penalties; and this, according to my understanding, is the first time that the Congress of the United States has stepped up to that duty.

Now, Mr. President, one thing to my mind is absolutely clear. Either the Government of the United States must take this step, and then advance one step further and take a kindred step making it possible for every Indian to become a citizen of the United States and honestly co-operate to that end, or it must contemplate his extinction at no remote day under circumstances which will be anything but honorable to a great country like ours.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if he does not think it would be well enough to go a little further and require them to become citizens of the United States, rather than keep alive these petty despotisms under a republican form of govern-

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If we make them amenable to our jurisdiction in all respects, what there would be left back of that would be merely technical; and I should not disagree with my honorable friend probably as to the course the Government should take in regard to that. The Indians now have got beyond any distinct nationality of character, certainly outside of the Indian Territory proper. They are by the very policy of our law and by the very circumstances of our civilization vagabond tribes, decimated, depleted, and driven from one point to another until now there is no last land to which they may farther go. Our civilization meets them upon the east and upon the west, and they are hemmed in from all quarters, and there is no ground that I know of on this continent where an Indian can put his face and feel that he is safe from invasion, from squatters, from the advance of population, which content to present the safe and th from the advance of population, which cannot be restrained as we have seen according to recent experience. That is the condition of things. Nothing on earth will save the Indians from utter extinction, and that speedily, except the shield of the law be thrown over them; and this is a right step in the right direction. That is plain to whoever and this is a right step in the right direction. That is plain to whoever looks at this law and sees its simple provisions.

That is the first proposition. What is the next? The next is to punish a man who commits a larceny or a trespass on a territory to which the Indian has an exclusive legal right. Is that simple proposition resisted in the Senate of the United States? Is the proposition resisted in the Senate of the United States that an Indian shall have a remedy for a larceny or a trespass, committed upon his property, in a court of law? I really heard my honorable friend from Minnesota, or else my ears misled me, resisting that proposition, suggesting that it was not expedient, and particularly that it was inexpedient as it would apply, as I understood him, to the Sioux reservation. My honorable friend from Vermont seemed to reply to that argument by reading the treaty stipulations in regard to the Sioux argument by reading the treaty stipulations in regard to the Sioux reservation. So far as language is concerned, so far as the solemnity of language is concerned, we took upon us there a most solemn contract that the rights under that treaty stipulation should never be invaded except by their consent. What is the answer to that? No answer is possible or conceivable except upon the ground that the Indian has no absolute or unqualified rights which we intend to protect

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator will allow me a moment, I know?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With great pleasure.
Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator did misunderstand the thought

I intended to convey

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very glad to hear it.
Mr. WINDOM. It was not that the Indians have no rights. I will go as far as my friend from Maine in protecting the rights of the Indians of this country. During my service in Congress I think I have done about as much labor for the Indian as almost any other one. But the ground upon which I put this case is this: this treaty having been violated by the Indians we are not now required in conscience or in law to pass a penal act to punish the men who are there. It is not a question whether white men went into that reservation rightly or wrongly; it is a question now—and I ask the attention of my honorable friend from Maine to it—whether under the circumstances of the case we are required in conscience or in justice to pass a penal act punishing those men who are there. I say that the circumstances surrounding this treaty are such that we are not compelled to pass it to day. I am willing to take up this question and consider it hereafter. I want to make this reservation an exception so that we may consider all the circumstances of the case and ask ourselves whether we are required to punish, by penal enactments, those men under the circum-

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, Mr. President, I do all honor to my honorable friend for his zeal in behalf of the Indians, and it was because I understood him to make a statement which seemed to contradict his history, that I ventured to allude to him.

I do not agree with my honorable friend at all that the Indians have violated this treaty. I know about this treaty from the beginning; I know about its inception; I know the course of the Government of the United States under the treaty; and I undertake to say that, so far as a violation of the treaty is concerned, the Indians are innocent. I think I know what I am saying. If there has been a violation of the treaty, it has been violated in the first place by Congress. Does not my honorable friend know that the second year of gress. Does not my honorable friend know that the second year of this treaty we refused to appropriate under it? Does not my honorable friend know that Congress refused to appropriate under this treaty as it was specified and declared the appropriation should be made? There was a wholesale violation of the treaty by us, openly, defiantly made. In the very second year of the treaty, with all its solemnities, we utterly repudiated it by the terms in which we appropriated, for we appropriated in gross leaving it at the discretion of the executive officers, instead of making the appropriation specifically according to the stipulation of the treaty. Had the Indian prior to that time shown any disposition to violate the treaty? Had we any occasion to complain that it was violated in any sense whatever? Not to my knowledge or belief.

What my honorable friend talks about now as a violation of the

What my honorable friend talks about now as a violation of the treaty is only the misconduct, as I understand it, not of the tribe, but of bad men among the Indians, misconduct, which, I am sorry to say, is not peculiar to Indians alone. No, sir; there is no instance where, so far as I know or believe, the great body of the Indians, the leading Indians, those who govern the tribes, have violated the treaty, while we have violated it in the particular manner I have suggested, and in various other ways through our agents, which have been reported to us from time to time. The most flagrant frauds and outrages have been committed upon these Indians, the great body of them peaceable and treaty abiding, and so it is to this day.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WINDOM. I notice that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommends that additional or larger appropriations shall be greate this.

ommends that additional or larger appropriations shall be made this year, and I would ask my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether he will recommend to the Senate to pay to these Indians or donate to them a million and a quarter or a million and a half of dollars this year without any condition con-nected with that appropriation requiring them to permit mining in that region of country?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend puts to me a hypothetical question. I have to say that he has that subject under his consideration, and I shall give a most respectful hearing, when he reports, to anything he may advise in regard to it. As at present advised, I may say that I am for standing by our treats which with a standing by our treats.

I may say that I am for standing by our treaty faith with the Indians.
Mr. WINDOM. So am I, Mr. President, but we are asked to appropriate a million and a half nearly over and above our treaty obligations. Now I want to say to the Senator that I will not vote one dollar to feed these Indians unless coupled with the condition that they shall permit the people to occupy that country for mining purposes. What I want to say in reference to that point is that I do not desire that want to say in reference to that point is that I do not desire that we should now adjudicate the question in reference to the Black Hills, but make it an exception from this bill, and let it come up by itself and be considered hereafter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not possible to conceive that this has the slightest relation to any question of appropriation that may arise in Congress.

I was about proceeding to remark upon the circumstances referred to by my honorable friend which bring the Indians in collision with the prospectors, or whatever they are called. They are not men, as I understand, in search of farms. They are not men who desire to go upon the public domain for homesteads and for settlement. They are men who are impelled by cupidity, by the desire of gain. They are prospecting. They are not accidentally there. They are not there by mistake. They are not there without knowing precisely what they are doing, that they are violating the obligations and faith of the Government of the United States; that they are there under the peril of producing an Indian war, of provoking an Indian war. Nobody knows it better than they do. Does my honorable friend mean to say that the Government stood quietly by and did not protest? My understanding of it is that the Government protested step by step, and, more than that, sent a military force to drive them out. Suppose it were not so. They were not ignorant of the law; they were not ignorant of the fact that that land was not open to settlement or open to be prospected. Heedless, regardless of that, lawless utterly, these men go where they know they have no right to go, and there is no palliation of that fact.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact existing that several thousand people are in that section of country to by my honorable friend which bring the Indians in collision with existing that several thousand people are in that section of country which is sought to be excepted by my amendment. The number will be increased very likely to ten thousand before this bill shall become a law, if it ever does become a law. I should like to ask the Senator how he thinks it would be possible to enforce the provisions of the bill upon ten thousand people and visit the penalties individually

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know, I confess. I have rather come to the conclusion that it is not possible to enforce penalties for a crime committed against an Indian anywhere. I have never known it done. I question whether it can be done, and I dare say that this law would be entirely nugatory so far as the enforcement of penalties is concerned in any jurisdiction before which parties might be brought. But that is not the question we are discussing. I am talking about a general principle, and because a certain class of lawless men happen to fall within a certain settled principle are we to make an exception in law to exempt those men before the case is heard or before we know the facts? I do not think that touches the case at all. The only in-the facts † I do not think that touches the case at all. The only interest I take in this whole bill is this: It is eminently fit that the Indians should have a day in court and a remedy for injuries committed upon them. In the second place, it is eminently fit that the law should say explicitly that for a violation of their rights in the terminant of the case of the case at all. The only interest I take in this whole the case at all. The only interest I take in this whole the case at all. The only interest I take in this whole the case at all. The only interest I take in this whole bill is this: It is eminently fit that the law should say explicitly that for a violation of their rights in the terminant of the case at all. law should say explicitly that for a violation of their rights in the territory set apart for them by the Congress of the United States, or by the Government of the United States, they should also have a remedy, and that the lawless persons who depredate upon their property and commit these crimes should be held amenable to the law. When that step is taken, it will be a wholesome thing for all law-abiding people in the western country; and it will be very much, in my judgment, to the advantage of the Treasury of the United States in regard to the large and constantly increasing expenditures growing out of the necessities of the case in regard to all our Indian relations. The principle of the second section of the bill is not very extraordinary. Let me read from the Revised Statutes:

The superintendent of Indian affairs, and the Indian agents and subagents, shall have authority to remove from the Indian country all persons found therein contrary to law; and the President is authorized to direct the military forceto be employed in such removal.

There is the principle which underlies this very act, but it is in fault in that it leaves it entirely to the discretion of the agent and to the remote and indirect methods which the President himself may inaugurate for their removal. Again, the Revised Statutes provide:

If any person who has been removed from the Indian country shall hereafter at any time return, or be found within the Indian country, he shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000.

Here is the principle of the law again in a very much more severe form than is provided for in this bill; but here for the first time, I repeat, the Indian is to be brought into court in order to have his rights defended and protected; and that is the chief value which I attach to this proposed law. I hope, therefore, that this bill will pass as it has come to us from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARVEY, (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOWE and others. I hope not. Let us pass this hill.

Mr. HARVEY. I believe this is the first time I ever moved an adjournment in the Senate, and I trust the Senators will yield.

Several SENATORS Withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas insist upon his motion? Mr. HARVEY. I do.

Mr. HARVEY. I do.
The motion was not agreed to.
Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think I ought to apologize to my friend, the Senator from Maine, for interrupting him when he was speaking of the beauties and virtues of the first section of this bill. I supposed that the principle embodied in the first section was already embodied in section 2145 of the Revised Statutes. If it is possible now to accomplish anything under the first section that is not accomplished under section 2145 of the Revised Statutes, I should be glad to have some Senator tell me what can be done under it. It is true plished under section 2145 of the Revised Statutes, I should be glad to have some Senator tell me what can be done under it. It is true a different phraseology is used. The words "Indian country" are used instead of "Indian reservation," but the words "Indian country" have a signification which is well understood and defined in the courts.

Mr. INGALLS. The commentary of the Senator from Iowa reminds me of an aneedote related of a French naturalist who described a crab me of an anecdote related of a French naturalist who described a crab as a small red fish that moved backward. Cuvier, in referring to it, said the description was very good, except that the crab was not red, was not small, and did not walk backward. Now, the section of the Revised Statutes to which the Senator refers—and he appealed to me for information on the subject—is very much like this first section, except in the fact that it does not resemble it at all, because the first line of this hill often the creating clause exceptions. this bill after the enacting clause expressly excludes the very territory which section 2145 includes. That is the only difference between the two provisions.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the Senator from Kansas for his crab illustration, and I still confess my ignorance.

That, except as to crime

I read from the first section of the bill-committed in the Indian country or upon any Indian reservation, the punishment of which is expressly provided for by laws of the United States, the general laws of the United States as to the punishment of crimes committed in any place, &c., shall

Mr. INGALLS. Section 2145 applies to the Indian country, which his bill expressly excepts.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand the Senator from Kansas to claim that the first section of the bill applies to a country other than the Indian country?

Mr. INGALLS. I supposed that the chairman of the Committee on

Mr. INGALLS. I supposed that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs was sufficiently versed in all matters relating to Indians to know that the term "Indian country," as here used, applies to what is better known as the "Indian Territory," the country south of Kansas and west of Arkansas, inhabited by the civilized tribes and by certain other tribes placed there by executive order. This bill is intended to apply to Indian reservations other than those that are existing in the Indian Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Then section 2145 of the Revised Statutes applies not to Indian reservations, but to the Indian country. I see the force of the criticism the Senator makes and believe him to be see the force of the criticism the Senator makes and believe him to be correct. I am willing to acknowledge an error when I have fallen into one, of course. I had not observed this bill until it came up for consideration the day before yesterday, and have not examined it since. If the provisions of this bill extend to all reservations and the provisions of the Revised Statutes only extend to the Indian Territory, the Senator is correct, and I thank him for making the suggestion; but I think the same difficulty will be found in enforcing the provisions of this bill as are now found in enforcing the provisions of the existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me a single moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.
Mr. INGALLS. To hear the remarks that the Senator has made and those that have been offered by other Senators who have spoken on this subject, it might be supposed that this bill contained an enun-ciation of some new principle of law or defined some novel and heretofore unexisting crimes, whereas the fact is that it merely provides a forum or a tribunal in which these crimes may be punished and where infractions of existing law can be ascertained and the penalties en-

Mr. ALLISON. That is precisely as I understand the law. I was not contending for any new principle and I do not understand that there is any new principle involved in this bill. I am only saying that I think the same difficulties will be found in endeavoring to enforce the provisions of this bill as are now found in endeavoring to enforce the provisions of law with reference to crimes in the Indian country. That is all I mean to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Still, there is some enforcement of the law at

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I will take as an illustration of the effect of this bill the instance cited by the Senator from Minnesota. There are a thousand miners in the Black Hills to-day, or whatever the number may be. If this bill becomes a law, those miners will be there in violation of an express provision of law.

Mr. INGALLS. They are now.

Mr. ALLISON. And in addition to that they will be subject to a penalty which they are not now subject to. Am I not correct in that ? This bill, if I understand it, provides a penalty as applied to the Sionx reservation-I only use that for illustration-which does not apply now to the Sioux reservation. Am I correct in that, I ask the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. INGALLS. No, the Senator is not correct, because, as I have repeatedly said, they are there upon that reservation in violation of law, the same as trespassers upon any other reservation are there in violation of law, the only difficulty being that at this time, although these things are acta prohibita under treaties and under existing statutes, there has been no forum provided in which these infractions of law can be determined and the penalties provided by the statutes or law can be determined and the penalties provided by the statutes or by the treaties enforced.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I am precisely right. This bill, then, simply adds a forum and provides a penalty, without the existence of which neither Torum nor penalty could apply to the Sioux reservation. I only want to see if I understand this bill correctly, and certainly the Senator will pardon me for making inquiries of the author of it. I Senator will pardon me for making inquiries of the author of it. I want to have the Senator inform me how the provisions of this bill can be enforced on the Sioux reservation. That is the question. There are, say, a thousand miners to-day in the Black Hills, or two thousand, if you please. You provide that they are "guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court having jurisdiction, shall be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned," &c. I am reminded right here of another illustration which I commend to the Senator from Kansas. I think it was laid down in a certain cookery leach that the first step toward each int. book that the first step toward cooking a hare is to catch it. I want to know how these penalties are to be enforced. How are you going to know how these penalties are to be enforced. How are you going to eatch the hare?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask the Senator, is it any objection to the passage of this bill, of general application all over the United States, that in a particular case the state of things is such that probably for a year, or two, or three, it cannot be enforced at all? Take the illustration of the rebellion, if I do not offend anybody by using that term. There were millions of people who were violating the laws of the United States in appropriating public revenues, and all that sort of thing. I am speaking of it as a mere question of law. Every one of the States in the South, and afterward the Confederate States, took up the public revenues that in point of law belonged to the United States, and the statute of 1846 makes anybody who takes public money liable to punishment. There was a time when, owing to peculiar circumstances, it was not very easy to enforce this law; but I money hable to punishment. There was a time when, owing to peculiar circumstances, it was not very easy to enforce this law; but I take it that fact would not lead my friend to vote against the law or refuse to assent to the passage of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. I am not arguing against the general provisions of this bill, at least I do not propose to do so if I am understood. I mean to say that as applied to the Sioux reservation this bill will be a dead letter on the statute-book, because under a provision of existing law the marshal who goes out from the Territory of Dakota to the Sioux reservation can only take three people with him as a posse comitatus to arrest a man, even after he is indicated in court.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to put a question to

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.
Mr. KERNAN. Would it do for one moment for Congress, in legislating in order to prevent infractions of the law, to make exceptions because men have become too strong to be made to obey the law, in any view of the case?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very pertinent question, and I think a very proper one. I do not seek now to make an exception because these men are violating law, as every man is violating law who is on the Sioux reservation to-day. I do not wish to make an exception in their favor, but I do believe that it is the duty of Congress to provide legislation which will be effective with reference to the Sioux reservation. This will not be effective.

Mr. HOWE. Now let me suggest to my friend that I think he

Mr. HOWE. Now let me suggest to my friend that I think he misapprehends the whole spirit of the first section, and it is upon that he is now speaking. The first section is to punish murder, to punish crimes which one white man commits upon another, crimes defined by the laws of the United States, crimes which those thousand or two thousand settlers are just as anxious to have punished as we are, and we have the same crimes punished in our States; and they are a posse comitatus themselves. Without the first section we cannot punish them at all. With the first section the United States comes to the rescue of the miner himself, opens its tribunal, furnishes its officer, and deals out that punishment which their peace and their welfare demand. Mr. ALLISON.

Mr. ALLISON. My remarks just a moment ago were intended to apply to the provisions of the whole bill. I understood the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine to arge upon the Senate the passage of this bill because it provided a punishment for the men who are invading the Black Hills in violation of law when no punishment was before provided and no penalty before inflicted.

Isliment was before provided and no penalty before immeted.

Mr. HOWE. That is under the second and third sections.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the second and third sections. Now I say that this is and will be, from necessity, a dead-letter on the statute-book as applied to the Sioux reservation. Therefore it must not be urged because of its effectiveness with reference to that reservation. Hence whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is on the bill or not on the bill will not affect its efficiency.

I only desire to make one or two remarks with reference to the general question of the Sioux reservation, because that has been brought into this debate. It was my fortune, as it was the fortune of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] to visit the friendly tribes of the Sioux last summer. We made their acquaintance. We gained the Sioux last summer. We made their acquaintance. We gained some knowledge of their habits, their customs, their modes and methods of life, &c. I fully agree with everything that has been stated by the Senator from Vermont and by the Senator from Maine with reference to the obligation of the treaty of 1868. It is a treaty, and as such we are bound to enforce it; but the question is, how shall we enforce it? If we agree upon the mode, the next question is, can we enforce it in the mode proposed? I undertake to say that to enforce to the letter the treaty of 1868 by the Army of the United States would require the whole military force of the United States. In the first place, they have on the eastern boundary, the Missouri River, nearly four hundred miles of reservation. They have a southern boundary of over four hundred miles bordering upon the State of Nebraska; and also a western boundary of nearly two hundred and fifty miles; and upon every rood of that line, south and east, it is possible for a man with a two-horse wagon, or a four-horse wagon, to march right into that country. Therefore the only way to keep men off that res-ervation is by a military police which shall be stationed from the ervation is by a military police which shall be stationed from the Missouri River to the eastern boundary of the Territory of Wyoming. I do not know how many men it would require for that purpose, but a very large body of police, certainly more cavalry than we have in the service at this time. Therefore, I say it is impossible to enforce the letter of this treaty, if the people of the United States are bound to break its spirit. If a miner in his thirst for gold cannot get into that reservation from the Missouri River, he will take the Union Pacific Railroad to Cheyenne and then make his way northward; he will find some place where the military forces have post protected the line. cific Railroad to Cheyenne and then make his way northward; he will find some place where the military forces have not protected the line, and he will march in there and finally reach the territory. Of course we can sustain three, four, or five thousand men in the hills, and in that way drive people out; but I think that would be rather a difficult process. All the military police would be obliged to be carried in there a distance of two, three, or four hundred miles.

The question is, and it is a practical question, what will the Government of the United States do with this new condition of things that has arisen there from the idea that there is gold in that country? That is a practical question which we must salve. We have got to

That is a practical question which we must solve. We have got to meet this condition of things as we find it now, not as it was in 1868. I perhaps have very little knowledge of what there is or may be in the Black Hills in the way of mineral product. I do not believe there is gold there in any great quantity, and I believe that the question will solve itself within a short time. We cannot take from the Indians that territory unless we adopt an entirely new policy with reference to the reservation. It is in the heart of the reservation from north to south, and it is practically impossible for us to allow white men to permanently settle in that reservation and still continue the Sioux reservation intact. An adjustment of our difficulties with the Sioux tribes would compel us to take into consideration the whole condition of these tribes; and it was a pertinent inquiry that the Senator from Minnesota put to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to what he would do with reference to appropria-tions for the coming year. We have appropriated now from five to six million dollars beyond our treaty stipulations for the support of these Sioux tribes. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will allow me, I Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will allow me, I suggest to bim that there was not so much pertinency in the inquiry after all as he may think. As I understood the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota, he put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to what he would do in case there was a necessity for a change of the public service. That is never a question proper to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or the Appropriation Committee itself. That committee appropriates for the service as it finds it. Therefore, I replied to the honorable Senator that I would hold to the public service as I found orable Senator that I would hold to the public service as I found it, and would hear him on an argument for the increase of the public service and would with due deference submit to any change of the public service next year.

Mr. WINDOM. Allow me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what he means by the "public service."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I mean by the "public service" that service which the Government of the United States is engaged in with reference to the Military, Naval, Indian, and other Departments.

Mr. WINDOM. I supposed the Senator meant that service provided

Mr. WINDOM. Isapposed in the property of the p

Mr. WINDOM. Its pertinency, if the Senator will allow me, was in this: We shall be compelled in all probability to appropriate a large sum of money for the Indian service. Now, what I want to do is to suspend action with reference to the Black Hills country by excepting it from this bill, and then when we come to the question of feeding those paupers next year let us settle the whole question in reference to the Black Hills. In that it is pertinent, and it tends to support my whole argument.

Mr. ALLISON. I only meant to say "pertinent" in this sense: that it is pertinent to the inquiry here, we having appropriated last year $1,100,000 for these Sioux tribes for subsistence alone, outside of and beyond our treaty stipulations; and the Secretary of the Interior has placed upon our table a letter stating that there is a deficiency of $235,000 now, and that the supply which we voted last year for the pending fiscal year will be exhausted by the 1st of March.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. ALLISON. My friend spent some time arguing the question of the obligations of the Government with reference to the Sioux treaty. I suppose he thought at the time it had some relevancy. I think it has some relevancy to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota as to whether this particular tribal reservation should be excepted from the provisions of this bill. I may be utterly mistaken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask my friend, if I do not unpleasantly interrupt him—

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Does he mean to say that because these Indians owe us a few hundred thousand dollars or a few million dollars, there-owe us a few hundred thousand dollars or a few million dollars, therefore we are not to provide punishment against lawless violations of their rights by white men?

Mr. ALLISON. If I did say so I certainly did not mean to say it. Mr. EDMUNDS. I supposed the Senator could not mean that.

Mr. ALLISON. Not for a moment do I suppose any such thing. Mr. EDMUNDS. Then what is the objection to passing the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I am trying to state it. I have reference to the condition of these Sioux Indians, that question being raised chiefly by the Senator from Vermont and by the Senator from Maine. I say that we have appropriated beyond our treaty stipulations, and when you come to the further consideration of the question whether or not the Sioux have violated this treaty, I think they have plainly violated it. They have never complied with a single element of it. They agreed in the treaty of 1868 that they would go to a place on the Missouri River and that they would there receive whatever bounty we chose to give them. They have absolutely from that time to this refused to go to the Missouri River, and they even to-day refuse to go upon their own reservation. They are not upon it; they are in the State of Nebraska, outside of their reservation, and refuse to be removed to it. As the Senator from Maine said, we were compelled to appropriate for their support in bulk one year, and that pelled to appropriate for their support in bulk one year, and that was because they refused to submit themselves to be counted under the treaty, so that we could not appropriate in accordance with the

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if there is not a question, at least to the mind of "the poor Indian," to his "untutored mind," &c., whether they have not a right to hunt in the western part of the State of Nebraska?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly there is a question in their mind. Mr. EDMUNDS. Then is there not a question in my friend's mind on the treaty and laws as they now stand?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no question in my mind with reference to the fact that they have refused to comply with important stipulations

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not my question. The Senator says that they have violated the treaty by hunting in the State of Nebraska. Now, have they not a right by existing stipulations to hunt in the State of Nebraska, and how can they hunt without going there?

Mr. ALLISON. If my friend will allow me just one moment, because I do not wish to be carried away by any incidental question with reference to the treaty, they are permanently in the State of Nebraska. They are not there for hunting purposes. They had authority to go to the Platte for hunting purposes. That authority was thority to go to the Platte for hunting purposes. That authority was arranged for by treaty stipulation last year, and they gave it up for a consideration of $25,000; but the agencies are in the State of Nebraska and outside of their reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Whose agencies? The agencies of the Sioux? Mr. ALLISON. The agencies of the Sioux.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; if the Government established their agencies in Nebraska, how are the Indians to get any of the benefits of the agencies if they do not go into that State?

Mr. ALLISON. They refuse to go on their reservation. I am merely stating the facts, showing the importance of treating with these Sioux independent of this particular law which provides punishment for people who may go upon Indian reservations.

people who may go upon Indian reservations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him whether I understand that the great difficulty with him is the penalty which may be incurred, if this bill should pass, by the men who are already in the Black Hills country?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In other words, I understand the honorable Senator to favor the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, which exempts those persons in the Black Hills country from the provisions of this act. That I understand to be the chief difficulty. Does not my honorable friend understand that they are under more severe penalties a great deal by the present law than are sought to be inflicted by this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I do understand that they are subject first to be removed by the military forces, and if they go back there a second time

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is a great deal stronger than that, if my honorable friend will allow me to read a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. I will, certainly. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Section 2118 of the Revised Statutes is:

Every person who makes a settlement on any lands belonging, secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or surveys or attempts to sur-vey such lands, or to designate any of the boundaries by marking trees or other-wise, is liable to a penalty of $1,000.

They are all in that condition, I fancy, according to the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. That is if they make a settlement

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, I wish to make this observation, if my honorable friend will indulge me one moment. So far as this penalty applies to these people, I do not think it is of the slightest consequence in the world.

Mr. ALLISON. Neither do I.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We are not legislating against these people at all. But for the Congress of the United States to be told that they must be restrained from making a general enactment applicable to all the people of the United States because it may fall heavily upon a certain class of people who are already within the penalties of the law and trangressors of the law to a very much more severe extent, strikes me as an anomaly in legislation. I submit that I do not suppose the Senator who introduced this bill nor the committee from whom it came had the slightest idea that any prosecutions would arise under it in this particular instance, because if these people are amenable to the law now proposed they are amenable to another law which will tell much more heavily upon them if it should ever be en-forced than this. Therefore I submit that there need not be the least apprehension, so far as that particular instance is concerned, if this bill should pass.

Mr. ALLISON. If this bill is not as rigorous as the existing law with reference to the particular things for which it provides, then of course there will be no harm in passing it entire; but the Senator from Maine will remember that these Black Hills people, so called, although they are there in violation of law, are not making settlements in the Black Hills. They are merely roving over these hills and marauding there. They are not settlers; they are not building and maranding there. They are not settlers; they are not building houses or making improvements. They are endeavoring to discover gold, and in my judgment they will find none that will pay them for going. That is what I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They will all be gone in nine months.

Mr. ALLISON. What I mean to say is that there is no particular harm in excepting from the provisions of this bill the region of country proposed to be excepted by the Senator from Minnesota, because his amendment confines the exception to the territory pay known as his amendment confines the exception to the territory now known as the Black Hills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would make a very violent break in the proprieties of legislation, the philosophy of legislation, the equality of laws, to say that laws for punishing crimes against the United States shall have force in one portion of the territories of the United States and not in another. I submit to my friend to think of that, whether an act of that kind, in the first place, could be properly constitutional; and, in the second place, if constitutional, whether it does not violate all our fundamental notions of criminal legislation. Taking it to be the fact that it is impossible to execute this law in this particular patch of the vast territory of this country, what of it? If it is not executed, it will not hurt the people who are violating it there. That is plain. Suppose a State was about to pass a prohibitory liquor law, and it was said: "Here is a particular county, like Suffolk County, in Massachusetts"—I am glad to see that neither of the Senators from that State is here, for otherwise I should not dare to use that illustration—"you cannot enforce the Maine law there; the Boston hotels and the bar-keepers will sell rum anyhow, and if you bring them up to a jury, somehow or other the case will not be made out." Would that be any reason for saying in Massachusetts, in passing a prohibitory law, that "in every county except Suffolk it shall be unlawful and punishable by penalty to sell intoxicating liquors?" Mr. President, I do not think my friend from Iowa would be the standard of the standard of the sellect of the selection wish really to stand upon that ground in the philosophy of legislative jurisprudence.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. I am in pursuit of information on constitutional law, and I want to ask the Senator this question: if excepting the Black Hills makes this bill unconstitutional, what effect does excepting the Indian Territory have? The bill now excepts it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can tell my honorable friend.

Mr. WINDOM. If one exception makes it unconstitutional, why not the other?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend is really asking that question in earnest, I will try to tell him. If he is asking it for a joke, I will give him the benefit of the joke. I have always understood that you could pass a law covering one class of subjects or objects, not excepting any, and not embracing all the objects in the world. This is a law about reservations. The Indian country is not a reservation. I take it, therefore without any violation either of principle or of constitutional law, you may make one provision for reservations and another provision for the unregulated vast expanse of territory that lies among the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator evidently conceives my question to be a joke, and answers it in that sense. Now I ask him, if he makes the exception of every reservation, in what condition is the second provision of the bill as to crimes committed "upon any Indian reserva-tion the punishment of which is expressly provided for by laws of the United States ?" There is another exception. You do not cover a peculiar case, so that the word "reservation" does not make it constitutional

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; there is not. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his construction of this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. You except the Indian country and reservations provided for by express laws.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; reservations provided for by express laws.

Mr. WINDOM. There are some reservations, then, not covered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because in respect of those reservations there are treaty stipulations which the Constitution says are the supreme law of the land, which provide another mode of punishment. I take it the Senator can appreciate that distinction; can he not?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot appreciate the former one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend can appreciate one distinction out of two he does better than most of us, so that I think we shall get on very well with that; but I see that my honorable friend from New York who has this bill in charge is not present at this moment, and as it is four o'clock, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WADLEIGH, Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to my friend from New Hampshire.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the report of the committee of conference on House joint resolution No. 52, directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to do certain things, was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other pur-

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I will state in the beginning-

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I will state in the beginning—Mr. HOWE. This does not displace the bill before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent this matter is interposed pending the consideration of Senate bill No. 32.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will state in the beginning for the information of the Senate that I do not propose to vote against this joint resolution. I propose to vote for it and to withdraw the motion for reconsideration. I desire, however, to state in a few words, and but a few, the reasons which prompted me in giving notice the other day of this motion for reconsideration.

I was intensely any jone that if any means could be devised by which

I was intensely anxious that if any means could be devised by which the bonds based upon and emanating from fraudulent claims could be separated from those emanating from good claims, it should be adopted; but I am satisfied that that cannot be done. The bonds have been issued; they carry on their face no ear-marks to denote the claims in which they originated. They are negotiable, and they are upon the market. If they are now in the hands of the men in this District who have committed these frauds, these thieves, I call them, it will be the easiest thing in the world for them to put them out of their hands into the hands of innocent holders before any investigation can reach them. It is utterly impracticable to separate the bad bonds, or the bonds originating in fraud, from those originating in good claims; and because of that impracticability, because of the ab olute impossibility of doing it, I shall withdraw the motion to re-

I am well aware of the objections which many members feel to the bassage of this bill for the reasons to which I have alluded. Of course this bill includes in the provision it makes the monstrous unlawful inthis bill includes in the provision it makes the monstrous unlawful increase of indebtedness over the amount allowed by law by the board of public works. This bill includes and pays, if passed it indorses, the bonds based upon frauds committed by the board of public works; frauds which have rung all over the country, and I was about to say have made the name of the District of Columbia infamous among the honest people of the country. This bill, if passed, also indorses and pays the interest on bonds issued to pay the counsel of the board of public works in resisting an investigation into their conduct ordered by Congress. It pays, too, the bill of those counsel for defending those who originated and carried out that despicable safe-burglary conspiracy, than which there is nothing worse that I ever heard or knew of in the history of the world—a conspiracy made between members of the board of public works or their creatures, between members of the board of public works or their creatures, and men on whose ankles and whose limbs were the marks of the gyves which proclaimed them to be felons, to ruin the reputation of an innocent man who had dared to incite an investigation into their conduct, which investigation was deserved.

Furthermore, Mr. President, all the frauds that have been committed in these monstrous extensions of contracts under absurd pretexts are to be recognized under this bill. I am aware of all that, but I say it is absolutely impossible to separate these claims. If we do not pay the whole of them we can pay none; and inasmuch as we should pay the honest claims, the honest bonds, as we should pay the bonds held by those parties who hold them in good faith or who have bought them in good faith, we should pay the whole. Therefore, I say, Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill.

It has been questioned here what party and who are responsible for a law which has led to results like these. The honorable Senator from a law which has led to results like these. The honorable Senator from California [Mr. Sargent] says he did not vote for the act of June 20, 1874, and that he warned us at the time of the results which would follow its passage. I know he did so; but at the time he did so he made the declaration that for what he had done in this District Boss made the declaration that for what he had done in this District Boss Shepherd would be hereafter canonized. The objections made by him were in favor of the continuance of the board of public works; and if this Senate was determined upon anything, if it was unanimous in anything, if it was decided in anything, it was that the board of public works should cease to exist then and there, and the vote upon that bill was practically unanimous. No party is responsible for its passage, no man is responsible for its passage. It has abolished the board of public works, and in that it has done a good thing. It has also by the issue of 3.65 bonds cloaked, and covered up, and prevented from being rectified the frauds that were committed and the immense illegal increase of the indebtedness of this District. But that is all past, and, as I said before, no man here, and no party here, is responsible for that bill, because for the purpose of wiping out the board of public works we all practically united in its passage.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask a question? Did I understand the Senator to say just now that 3.65 bonds were issued to pay the counsel who defended the board of public works before the committee, and who also defended the conspirators who were indicted for the safe

Mr. WADLEIGH. I understand that the gentlemen who conducted that defense on the part of the board of public works carried in their bills to the board of audit, and that $12,000 of their claim was albins to the board of audit, and that $12,000 of their claim was allowed, and bonds for that sum now stand against this District in the hands of somebody. I have made the inquiry and find that it is so. But, as I said before, we cannot refuse to pay the honest people who hold the bonds of this District. We are bound to carry out our contract with them. We cannot separate the one from the other, because they all appear alike and stand alike in the market, and for that reason I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I submit as a question of order that a motion to reconsider cannot be withdrawn by the mover without the leave of the Senate being first had and obtained; and if the allegations that are made by the Senator from New Hampshire are true, I think certainly it ought not to be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL.) The motion cannot

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. AITCHELL.) The motion cannot be withdrawn, if objection is made, without the consent of the Senate. Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask leave to withdraw the motion. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BOGY. Is that decided by a majority vote or by one objection? The PRESIDING OFFICER. By a majority vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A majority controls it. The Senate can grant

Mr. EDSICIOS. A majority controls it. The Schale can grante leave if they like.

Mr. BOGY. I am not anxious to speak on this bill; I am never anxious to speak on any bill; yet I would like to say a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of granting leave is not debatable.

Mr. BOGY. It seems to me the friends of the bill ought not to prevent us from discussing it. The Senator from New Hampshire has opened a new subject of investigation.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I have opened no new subject for investigation.

The matter to which I referred was alluded to in the Senate days ago. This bill, if it passes the Senate, goes to the House of Representatives. If the House of Representatives can by the exercise of any ingenuity

If the House of Representatives can by the exercise of any ingenuity devise a means to separate these claims, so be it—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire suspend a moment? The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire has asked leave of the Senate to withdraw his motion to reconsider. That question, the Chair was informed, is not debatable. He will submit to the Senate the question of granting leaves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Chair will not make the ruling that that is not debatable without stating upon what ground he thinks so. I do not remember anything in the rule, and I am quite sure there is no the rule. not not remember anything in the rule, and I am quite sure there is nothing in the rule of the Senate providing that a motion to reconsider shall not be withdrawn without leave of the Senate which says that that question shall be decided without debate. There are other rules of the Senate as to certain questions which say that they shall be decided without debate; but there is no limitation I think upon the provision in respect to withdrawing a motion to reconsider. Inasmuch as it is a question submitted to the Senate it is open to debate, unless the rules say otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that this is the first time the case has occurred; and the Chair will allow debate to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment or two. The report of this committee combines four distinct propositions: First, to pay the interest due on the 1st of February, which is now past; second, no further issue of 3.65 bonds shall be allowed; third, a repeal of the powers of the board of audit; and, fourth, no further increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, before I can vote for this report I would make this inquiry of the Senators who have looked into the subject for a good while back: What is the present debt to-day provided for under this report? I am informed by the Senator from California near me [Mr. SARGENT] I am informed by the Senator from California near me [Mr. Sargent] that it is something less than $15,000,000. Of course I will not dispute the word of the Senator; but it is not the right way to impart information to justify our action in this body. We ought to know that fact by the report of a committee. We do know the fact that in June, 1874, when the act of that date was passed, it was thought that the debt of this District amounted to about $8,000,000. We are now called upon to provide for $15,000,000, and as I am not prepared to say that this increased amount is right or wrong, I should like to know how this immense increase was brought about; I should like to trace the allowance of these claims. The papers are full of rumors, and they may or may not be well founded; but I read only a few days ago of a person having a claim for $800 who sold that claim to a member of the District ring, after which it was allowed and paid for at ago of a person having a claim for $800 who sold that claim to a member of the District ring, after which it was allowed and paid for at the rate of $8,000. I understand the fact is so, and there are many other facts as manifestly outrageous as this one fact.

I think it is due to this body, it is due to this country, that before we take another step with regard to any appropriation for the District of Columbia we should know the amount of the debt that we are to provide for, know how that debt was created, whether fraudulent claims were allowed or not. Why should we not know it? The charges have been made, and have never been denied in authentic shape; and I say the Senate of the United States owes it to its own dignity not to permit any charge of that kind to go to the country dignity not to permit any charge of that kind to go to the country without being explained. Is it true that $12,000 of 3.65 bonds were issued for the payment of counsel to protect the ring that had been guilty of all these immense robberies? If that be true and those bonds can be traced in the hands of any of those parties, they ought not to be paid. I would do nothing to impair the credit of this na-tion; but the best way to maintain the credit of a man or of a nation tion; but the best way to maintain the credit of a man or of a nation is to see that you do not pay fraudulent claims brought against you. This committee has had this matter under consideration for some time; these facts have been stated before; and we are not better informed now than we were on the very first day. I say it is due to us that we should know all the facts. I as a member of this body cannot vote for this report until I do know them. I am willing to pay the interest on the bonds due on the 1st of February if that amount is definite so that there can be no danger about it; and it is right to provide that there shall be no further issue of bonds; but I would like to know how many there are out now. I would like to know how many there are out now. I would like to know how many there are out now. I would like to know it is not a second now. like to know how many there are out now. I would like to know it in an official, authentic form. I would repeal the board of audit, and I would like to know how many claims have been allowed by the board of audit since this question has been discussed in both Houses of Congress, and whether these claims were fraudulent or not.

We are justified in believing and asserting that there has been immense fraud in all this business. I certainly am not disposed to avail myself of my seat on this floor to charge any citizen, high or low, with fraud, but we are justified in saying that there has been shameful, infamous, illegal fraud in all these matters; and yet we have no information; we do not know the facts. There can be no harm done in post-poning this thing. The 1st of February has passed, and as far as the effect of a protest is concerned the effect has taken place. Then the 22d of February, that holiday referred to by the Senator from Ohio a few days ago, has passed, and we did not pay this interest. Now that all these great epochs have passed we are left without any great reason why we should pass this bill to-day. I call for investigation. I wish to know the amount of the debt so that hereafter we may not be told "When you provided that there should be no more issue of bonds you certainly legalized the issue up to the present day, let that be fifty millions." Indirectly you legalize the full amount which has been issued, regardless of what it may be, by saying that there shall be no further issue. If you say that, the issue made thus far is certainly binding on you by your own legislation. I wish to know it. I think we ought to know it. I desire to know if claims have been multiplied tenfold as it is reported. I should like to find out the men in the city of Washington who are all the time stealing from the public Treasury. There is a ring here; there has been a ring; and I fear that our system of legislation will transmit that ring. Although I know it is not the intention of a single member on this floor, nevertheless such is the effect. Postpone this matter; appoint a committee to examine it; let us see what the board of audit has done. It may be a laborious task, but there are plenty of Senators here willing to undergo the labor. Examine whether it be true that claims have been multiplied in the manner which has been stated, and I believe they have been; examine whether it be true that bonds have been issued to counsel whom they employed to defend themselves when charged with stealing and robbery.

At this late hour of the day's session I do not wish to discuss this matter. It was not my intention originally to take part in the debate at all, but I think that the point has been narrowed down simply to this: Shall we shut our eyes, keep them closed, hermetically sealed, when all these charges are made, and order no investigation? Let us open our eyes for the first time and find out who are the thieves. All this talk about the credit and the faith of the nation amounts to I am as anxious to maintain the public credit as any Senanothing. I am as anxious to maintain the pholic credit as any sena-tor upon this floor. I would go as far and make as many sacrifices as any other to maintain it; but I do not think that question is involved in the passage of this bill at this time. Let it be postponed, and let a committee of this body examine the doings of this board of audit, and see how many claims have been allowed even since this subject has been under discussion in Congress, and see how this seven mill-ions augmentation over the eight millions of debt supposed to exist two years ago has been brought about. Certainly a private individual doing his own business would take that course, and I think as public men we should do the same thing.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I suppose neither the honorable

Senator from Missouri nor any other Senator on this floor supposes that I would desire to do anything to countenance in any way the frauds which I have alluded to and which I believe to have been comfrands which I have alluded to and which I believe to have been committed in this District.

Mr. BOGY. Most certainly not.

Mr. WADLEIGH. But, Mr. President, as a practical question, what can be gained by refusing to pass this bill? My friend from Missouri says we can investigate; but it is absolutely impossible by any investigation to separate these bonds one from the other.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I apprehend there is no difficulty whatever. Let the board be required to show not only what claims they investigated and passed upon, but their books should exhibit the number of each bond issued in payment of a claim. I apprehend, therefore, that, if the suggestion of my friend from Missouri is complied with, if this bill is laid aside of my friend from Missouri is complied with, if this bill is laid aside and an investigation had, a report can be made to the Senate which will show not only the claims allowed, but every bond issued in payment of each separate claim. In my opinion that ought to be done.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I have no doubt that that can be done which my friend from Delaware says can be done; but to what good? These bonds have been issued. There is nothing upon their face to indicate for what particular claim.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask my friend from New Hampshire whether it is charged that the board issued bonds fraudulently, in violation of the law, or that they issued more than the law allowed. Which charge is made? That they violated the law or that they issued more bonds than they were entitled to?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not suppose they have issued more than

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not suppose they have issued more than the certificates presented called for.

Mr. MAXEY. Or were there frauds in fact? Were the audits fraud-

Mr. WADLEIGH. I believe that some of the claims were fraudu-

Mr. MAXEY. Then I will ask the Senator if we cannot refuse to pay such bonds?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No; because by the bill which we passed abolishing the board of public works we created a board of audit which should audit all claims presented and issue certificates thereon for the amounts found due; and then we provided in the same bill that when those certificates were carried to the sinking-fund commissioners they should issue these District 3.65 bonds therefor. The board of audit have found in favor of these claims. They have issued certificates therefor. The certificates have gone to the sinking-fund commissioners, whom I believe to be honorable men. The sinking-fund commissioners have issued bonds as the law required of them. The bonds on their face show no evidence of the claims upon which they are based. They are not distinct one from another. They have gone They are not distinct one from another. They have gone tion. The men who procured them upon fraudulent claims into circulation. would not hold them, and as a matter of course, they put them off, and they have gone into the hands of innocent parties who paid for them their market value and who are entitled in law and equity to receive from this District the interest on those bonds.

Mr. MAXEY. There is such a thing as fraud in law. If parties have gone beyond their powers under the law; if the law, in other words, made these parties trustees, and authorized them to issue bonds, and they issued more than the law authorized, then as a matter of course the holders would be protected. That would be fraud in law; but there is also such a thing as fraud in fact. If this board of audit audited more than the law entitled, and audited and allowed claims not entitled to be audited, that is fraud in fact; and, if I understand the law, fraud vitiates everything and renders the act utterly null and void; and no act of these men could confer validity upon a fraudulent and void proceeding.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am by no means sure that any fraud whatever can be charged upon the members of the board of audit. I have talked with some persons who acted upon that board, and whom I know to be honorable men, and they have assured me that the certificates and the evidence made up and presented to them by the board of public works compelled them, in their judgment, to allow

Mr. MAXEY. If the claimants themselves presented fraudulent claims and secured the audit of those fraudulent claims, the principle applies that the fruits of the audit are void. No act of the board of audit could confer validity upon that which was void on account of that I possibly could, with a view to see if it were possible in any way to separate these bonds, so that we might evade the payment of those based upon fraud. I hoped that it might be done; but it cannot be done; it is absolutely impossible. If you investigate ever so much, you will simply find that a board of audit created by us, acting within its vested powers, issued certificates; that those certificates went to the sinking-fund commissioners created by us; that the sinking-fund commissioners were bound by the law which we made to issue bonds thereupon; that negotiable 3.65 bonds had been issued in accordance with the law; that into whosesoever hands they may have gone in the first place, they will be found now, or at the time when an investiga-tion takes place, to be in the hands of innocent parties, who have paid for them their full value. Now, what is the use of waiting until you can have an investigation, when the investigation will simply disclose fraud which does not affect the liability of the District upon these bonds, they having been issued by those having the power to issue them and being in the hands of parties who received them in good faith?

It has been said that we need to investigate so as to know the facts. I understand that the House of Representatives is investigating, and that through that investigation we shall know. But there is no need to postpone the passage of this bill. We are bound just as much to pass it if we find that there has been fraud as though we find that frauds have not been committed, because if we authorize negotiable bonds to be issued and people have bought them in good faith and for a valuable consideration it would be infamous for us, faith and for a valuable consideration it would be infamous for us, as infamous as anything the board of public works has done, to evade or refuse to pay them when they are held by parties who bought them in good faith. There is not a man on this floor who would ask such a thing or would advocate it if it were proposed.

Then, inasmuch as this investigation can do no good in this respect, why not pass this bill and pay the people who hold these bonds in good faith, who bought them for a valuable consideration, and who upon every principle of law and equity are entitled to their pay? Then let an investigation be had; let the truth come to light. If frands have been committed, let them be shown up; and if there is any remedy, let the Government seek that remedy; let it be sought through Congress or in any way. But there is no practical remedy any remedy, let the Government seek that remedy; let it be sought through Congress or in any way. But there is no practical remedy in refusing to pay negotiable bonds of the United States issued by officers having the power to issue them and held by parties who in good faith have paid their money for them. What Senator is there on this floor or what Representative on the floor of the other House who would advocate that? I know my friend from Delaware would not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will pardon me for making a suggestion. There may be bonds now in the hands of parties who presented original claims to the board of audit, and that is one reason why I want the investigation to be had before we pay. If you find a bond in the hands of a party who committed fraud in the presentation of a fraudulent claim, I do not hesitate to say that I would stop the payment of his bond until his account was properly corrected.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The views which the Senator from Delaware has expressed were the very views which led me to give notice of this motion to reconsider. I had that very thing in my mind at the time

I gave the notice.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator pardon me for suggesting that if the fact of fraud is established in the issuance of a bond, there is a prima facie case against the holder of the bond, and does it not devolve on him to prove that he is an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration in good faith and without notice?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No; because we gave to officers of the United States, under a law passed by us, power to issue these very bonds, to make them negotiable, to give them the credit of the Government, and undoubtedly they have passed into the hands of innocent par-ties. I know there is force in the suggestion of my friend from Dela-ware; but remember that these bonds are negotiable and pass from hand to hand; that they show upon their face no indication of the character of the claim upon which they are based; that the men who procured the bonds by fraudulent claims would not keep them, and probably they have all passed from their hands before now. At any rate it is certain that those bonds, which cannot be distinguished from the others, before any investigation can be had or any evidence can be reached, would be passed into the hands of innocent parties who buy them for value received and hold them in good faith.

Mr. MAXEY. Is not the principle to which I referred applicable? The Senator is placing it on the ground that the paper is negotiable.

The Senator is placing it on the ground that the paper is negotiable. Is not that principle applicable to a negotiable promissory note? The fact being established that your note has been frandulently obtained, does not that make a prima facic case against the holder of that promissory note, who claims to be an innocent purchaser, and devolve on him the duty of proving his innocence? If that be true of a promissory note, is it not true of a negotiable bond?

Mr. WADLEIGH. That might be true perhaps in some cases in reference to promissory notes; but allow me to beg the honorable Senator from Texas to pause and reflect a moment upon the fact that these bonds do not stand in the same position as any negotiable notes. Here were certain claims against the District of Columbia. Congress provided a tribunal for the District before which the claimants might go, and authorized the board of audit, if they found those claims to go, and authorized the board of audit, if they found those claims to be just, to issue thereupon certificates upon which the sinking-fund commissioners should issue negotiable bonds. It is like my friend examined this matter with all the diligence and with all the industry | from Texas saying in a case somewhat similar to the one he referred to: "Here is my agent; I leave the matter to him; he will investigate it; if he finds that this is due he will issue a note as my agent which I will pay;" and when the agent has made the investigation and, although the claim was fraudulent, has found that it was not, but that it was valid and the note has been issued, my friend from Texas would have to pay that note because he intrusted his agent with the power of issuing it; and where of two parties one must suffer the party must suffer who has been in fault, and in that case my friend from Texas would have authorized the issuing of the note.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to grant permission to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would ask the Chair to state again precisely the question upon which we are to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion pending is to permit the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his motion to reconsider; and the Senator from Maine moves to lay that motion on the table. The Chair rules that it is in order. The Chair rules that it is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be laid on the table, then the motion to reconsider will be left pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be pending.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. Alcorn answered

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to know the effect of this motion.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call cannot be interrupted.
Mr. RANSOM. I only want to understand the vote.

THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 6, for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States, for reference to the Committee on Public Lands

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will withhold his request for the present, as the Chair will ask permission to take up and refer all bills upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. PAGE. I will do so.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I find by reading the report in the Record of the debate of the day before yesterday, which grew out of the question of privilege raised by my colleague and friend, [Mr. Springer,] that some words used by me are liable to an interpretation which would do injustice to a gentleman not a member of this House and to myself—and which of course was not intended or desired by me. I refer to the statement I made, as shown by the RECORD, in the discussion of a construction that might be put upon the amendment offered by my colleague to the centennial bill, and that General Hawley understood that to be the construction immediately after the passage of that bill. In this remark I did not intend to refer at all to the construction which I have since learned has been put upon that amendment by Judge Black and by the late Hon. Reverdy Johnson. I had been called from the floor when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] took the floor, and, just coming to my seat as he was about to conclude his remarks, I was when the gentleman from Findols [Mr. SPRINGER] took the hoot, and, just coming to my seat as he was about to conclude his remarks, I was not aware of all the facts before the House. I had never heard of the construction put upon that amendment by the eminent jurists Judge Black and Mr. Johnson. I see, too, that the RECORD makes me say that "when that amendment was passed one of the centennial commissioners came to me." I certainly intended to say, and thought I did say, when the bill and amendment were passed this gentleman came to me. That gentleman was General Hawley. So far was he from knowing of the enlarging construction of Judge Black, he proposed that the Senate ought to strike out the amendment. The bill was then already passed and he was unwilling that what he considered the illiberal amendment should remain attached to the bill. But he was willing to accept the appropriation with the most restrictive construction. But he doubted if the amendment would take from the stockholders their vested rights. This fact I brought to the knowledge of my colleague. He said he would look into it, and if his amendment was not strong enough he would bring in a supplemental bill. As he has not done so, I supposed he had found his amendment sufficiently strong and did not know of any enlarging construction until I read the RECORD of yesterday. I read the RECORD of yesterday.

AMENDMENT OF PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2265) to amend an act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and acts amendatory thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. I ask unanimous consent to present the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas it is alleged that disbursing officers, agents, collectors, receivers, and other persons having in their custody or possession moneys of the United States have illegally appropriated the same and made default in accounting therefor and practiced gross frauds upon the Government by means of which it has sustained great loss: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be, and they are hereby, directed to make an investigation of the accounts of all disbursing officers, agents, collectors, receivers, and other persons having in their possession moneys of the United States from the 1st day of July, 1865, to the 30th day of June, 1875, and to ascertain whether any such officer or person has illegally appropriated or made default in accounting for the same or any part thereof, or in any manner violated the laws of the United States regulating the application of such moneys, and to what extent, if any. And said committee is hereby instructed to report to this House, by bill or otherwise, the result of such investigation, together with any recommendation in the premises it may deem advisable, and said committee in conducting such investigation shall have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. On that resolution I want to interpose an objection, unless the gentleman who submits it names the instances to which it applies. As it stands, the resolution is a universal charge upon all disbursing officers. If the gentleman will name the instances which he desires to have investigated, I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. The reports of the Departments show that there have been such defaults.

Mr. KASSON. I rose to claim the Speaker's attention when objections were asked for.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist upon his objection? Mr. KASSON. I insist upon my objection, unless the resolution be modified in the way I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels bound to accept the statement of

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels bound to accept the statement of the gentleman from Iowa as to his having risen in time to object; and, objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. To obviate the objection of the gentleman from Iowa, I am willing to omit the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. James B. Reilly,] that for the present he withdraw the resolution for the purpose of ascertaining what effect the tribing out of the present leaves and have seen the large state that the state of the state of the text. striking out of the preamble would have on the language of the text. If he withdraws it now he may again offer it.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. Then I withdraw the resolution for the present.

A joint resolution was passed by Congress request-ing and authorizing the President to have medals made to present to each of these ten individuals. Nine of these medals were presented; but one of the parties, William H. H. Nash, died before the medal was completed. This resolution is for the purpose of having the medal made for him presented to his widow—he leaves no children—as the one nearest to him. The President does not feel authorized to present it to any other than the person named in the resolution without instructions from Congress.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Be it resolved, As the sense of this House, it is unwise and inexpedient to legislate with reference to any radical change in the tariff laws as they now exist until after resumption of specie payment by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution ? Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it not belong to the Committee on Public Lands 7

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes past one o'clock, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature. The call rests with the Committee on the Territories.

SLAUGHTER OF BUFFALOES.

Mr. FORT. The Committee on the Territories have instructed me to report back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1719) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States. The committee unanimously recommend its passage.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person who is not an Indian to kill, wound, or in any manner destroy any female buffalo of any age, found at large within the boundaries of any of the Territories of the United States. States.

The second section provides that it shall be, in like manner, unlawful for any such person to kill, wound, or destroy in the Territories any greater number of male buffaloes than needed for food by such person, or than can be used, cured, or preserved for the food of other persons, or for the market. It is to be in like manner unlawful for any such person or persons to assist or be in any manner engaged or concerned in or about such unlawful killing, wounding, or destroying of any such buffaloes. Any person violating the provisions of the act shall, on conviction, forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $100 for each offense, (and each buffalo so unlawfully killed, wounded, or destroyed shall be and constitute a separate offense,) and, on a conviction for a second offense, may be committed to prison for a period not exceeding thirty days. All United States judges, justices, courts, and legal tribunals in the Territories are to have jurisdiction in cases of the violation of the act.

Mr. FORT. I will detain the House but a few moments with any remarks in relation to this bill. The buffaloes which roam over the Territories of the United States are fast disappearing. The intention and object of this bill is to preserve them for the use of the Indians, whose home is upon the public domain, and to the frontiersmen, who may properly use them for food. Where once there were thousands of buffalo there are now but hundreds. They have been, and are now being, slaughtered in large numbers, and must soon disappear. Thousands of these noble brutes are annually slaughtered not for food. sands of these noble brutes are annually slaughtered, not for food, but slain out of mere wantonness. Hundreds and thousands of them are shot down upon the plains, as I am informed, for sport. The Indians are disposed to look upon these creatures as their own herds, their own cattle, and they regard with jealousy the destruction of what they deem to be their property, and believe they should be preserved for them.

Certainly no good can come from this continued slaughter. These animals are harmless; they injure no one. Civilization has no war with them. In the judgment of the committee, they should be as far as possible preserved for the use, not only of the Indians upon the plains, but for those settlers who go to the frontier for legitimate purposes and settlement, and should only be killed for food and for their

This bill just as it is now reported passed the last Congress. passed the House then, I believe, without a dissenting voice; but it was net passed in the Senate until toward the last of the session, as I was not passed in the senate until toward the last of the session, as I am informed, and failed to receive the approval of the President, as I am further informed, only because more important matters occupied attention until Congress adjourned. It was not vetoed, but fell, as I understand, merely for want of time to consider it after having passed both House

It is said by some that the bill is well enough, but that it relates only to the Territories, while in Kansas, where large numbers of these buffaloes are destroyed, it would have no force. Every gentleman, upon a moment's reflection, must see that this cannot be otherwise. The United States Government has no jurisdiction within the boundaries of any State for such purpose. It must be left for the different States to make such regulations as they choose for preserving the game within their limits. All we can do is to preserve these buffaloes where

One further remark. Every member of this House is aware that we are annually furnishing at heavy cost thousands and thousands of beef cattle to the Indians for food. It seems to me wrong that these vast herds of the plains, which have grown up in the course of nature without any cost to us, should be uselessly, cruelly, and wantonly destroyed, while at the same time we are called upon to expend so much money annually for the purpose of supplying the place of these animals with domestic cattle. I can see no reason why the bill should not pass now, as it passed before. I will not detain the House longer in its discussion at this time.

Mr. CROUNSE. Will not the gentleman consent to an amendment striking out the words "who is not an Indian," so as to make the bill general? I apprehend that the only destruction to be complained of to any material extent is that committed by the Indians. That done by the white man is very limited. If the object is the preservation of the buffalo for the use of the Indian, I can see no reason why he should not be restricted in the wanton destruction of these animals. The bill seems to me nugatory unless this discrimination be wiped out. There should be no other law for the Indian than for the white man. They should be both alike amenable to all laws. If it is wrong for a white man wantonly to destroy the buffalo, it is equally wrong for an Indian. I hope the gentleman will at least consent to test the sense of the House on the amendment which I suggest.

I might add that the very liberty which is now allowed the Indianthe license to hunt the buffalo promiscuously—leads him to wander away from his reservation into Nebraska and elsewhere; and thus arise many of the troubles connected with the Indian question. the gentleman permit the sense of the House to be tested on this amendment?

I would have no sort of objection to an amendment in accordance with the gentleman's suggestion did I deem it necessary, and were it not for difficulties that would arise in prosecuting Indians. My info: mation has been that it is not the habit of Indians to destroy buffalo wantonly, merely for the sake of the sport. This destruction has principally been carried on by white men. If, however, it be thought that such an amendment as the gentleman suggests would improve the bill, I of course must consent. If the Indian is to be restrained I hope it will be done by a separate law, for the reason that intricate treaties would have to be considered. We all know that prosecutions, or rather the punishment, of Indians would have to be performed by a different authority in most cases. I presume that the committee who have had the bill under consideration would interpose no objection were it not for those reasons. I of course have no authority to accept any amendment; all power to amend is with the remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Illinois. think the present bill is one of great importance, and if rightly understood by the House possibly no objection will be urged to it. The bill to which allusion has been made as having passed the last House of Representatives was reported from the Committee on Public Lands. It will be remembered when it was under discussion that the Delegate from Arizona at that time submitted some very interesting remarks on the habits of the buffalo and also in relation to the wanton destruction of that animal. I will ask the Clerk to read first an extract from a paper in New Mexico, next an extract from a letter of General Hazen, and then a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Brockett, of the United States cavalry. These three short extracts will show the value of this animal and the wantonness with which it is destroyed, and they constitute an unanswerable argument in favor of the passage of this bill. I simply ask those extracts be read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would add a single word to the

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The buffalo slaughter which has been going on the past few years on the plains, and which increases every year, is wantonly wicked and should be stopped by the most stringent enactments and most vigilant enforcement of the law. Killing these noble animals for their hides simply, or to gratify the pleasure of some Russian duke or English lord, is a species of vandalism which cannot too quickly be checked. United States surveying parties report that there are two thousand hunters on the plains killing these animals for their hides. One party of sixteen hunters report having killed twenty-eight thousand buffaloes during the past summer. It seems to us there is quite as much reason why the Government should protect the buffaloes as the Indians.

I know a man who killed with his own hand ninety-nine buffaloes in one day, without taking a pound of the meat. The buffalo for food has an intrinsic value about equal to an average Texas beef, or say $20. There are probably not less than a million of these animals on the western plains. If the Government owned a herd of a million oxen they would at least take steps to prevent this wanton slaughter. The railroads have made the buffalo so accessible as to present a case not dissimilar.

OMAHA BARRACKS, NEBRASKA, January 30, 1872.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not examined the bill and do not know exactly what are its provisions, but the object it has in view is altogether proper and right. I know this from some personal experience among the Indians and of the wanton and reckless destruction of buffaloes. It has been for many years a common practice for hunting parties and for men upon pleasure excursions to kill buffalo by the hundreds and thousands. It is a very large animal and useful to man, and should be protected from useless and wanton destruction.

They are not only killed out of mere sport, but it has been common to destroy them by hundreds and thousands merely for their hides and tongues. This certainly is a cruel waste, and when we remember that now, instead of having to travel on horseback a great distance in order to reach them, the country over which they roam is penetrated by railroads, and access is made more easy, we can readily see how this sport can be indulged in to a greater extent than for-merly. It will be understood that, unlike domestic cattle, they roam over the plains from north to south and from south to north accord-ing to the season. In winter they go toward southern New Mexico and Texas, and in summer they pass up into our northern Territories.

They gather together in vast herds, which makes their destruction comparatively easy to those who seek it. It is not like hunting other game scattered about, only a few in each place; but these buffalo, roaming from south to north or from north to south, as the weather roaming from south to north or from north to south, as the weather and the grass invite, in large bodies, we find that, in addition to killing them for food and for useful purposes, persons out of mere sport indulge in their wanton destruction, while others engage in killing them merely for their hides and tongues. A law certainly should be made to prevent this.

The Indians, like the buffalo, go north or south according to the season, and generally travel in the track of the buffalo. The hunting of the buffalo affords them their chief means of subsistence. If these animals can be preserved from wanton destruction, it will save a animals can be preserved from wanton destruction, it will save a great deal to the Indians, and certainly will save a great deal to the Government in caring for them.

It has been mentioned here that the buffalo likewise should be protected against wanton destruction by the Indians as well as by the So far as I have had any personal observation on the subject, whites. So far as I have had any personal observation on the subject, the Indians do not seek wantonly to destroy them. They regard them as a species of property, as the means of subsistence, and they desire to see them preserved beyond what is necessary for their subsistence. It may be that there are cases where they do destroy them merely for their tongues, hides, and horns. If they do, it would be wise to extend the provision of the law so as to prevent any such wanton destruction on their part as well as on the part of the white people in hunting parties and excursions by pleasure-seekers, who wantonly destroy. ing parties and excursions by pleasure-seekers, who wantonly destroy buffaloes by the hundreds and thousands, and waste valuable food which should be preserved for the subsistence of the Indians as well as of the whites who explore the plains or live upon the frontier.

I do not know the particular provisions of this bill, but the object sought is a beneficent one, and, if properly guarded, the bill ought cersought is a beneficent one, and, if properly guarded, the bill ought certainly to be enacted into law.

Mr. JENKS. I rise to offer an amendment, to come in at the fourth line of the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is an amendment already pending, offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.] Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. JENKS. I would like to hear the pending amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JENKS. The amendment I desire to offer is an amendment to another section. If it be proper that the pending amendment be disposed of first, I will offer mine afterward. It is in accord with the spirit of the bill and intended to carry out its purpose.

man who has the bill in charge I believe will accept it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be in order after that now pending has been disposed of. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope the amendment will be adopted. There can be no reason why the white man should be forbidden to kill the female buffalo while the privilege of killing her is allowed to the Indian. The object is to preserve the game.

the game be destroyed, it makes no difference whether it be by the rifle of the Indian or the rifle of the white man.

It will be found perfectly impracticable for us to have one law for the Indian and another law for the white man. We have now got down to the doctrine of equality, and our boys on the frontier have always been believers in the doctrine of equality, so far at least as to give them as much right as anybody else; and I believe it would be found utterly impracticable to enforce any law that gives a privilege to the red man which would not be enjoyed by the white man. Besides, it is right in principle that there should be no distinction. And I hope yet before this session is over to see the Indian, even in his conduct toward other Indians, made amenable in the Territories of the United States to our laws for the punishment of crime. We shall have made a great step toward settling the Indian question when the United States laws intervene to protect one red man from the violence of another red man. This should not have been left unprovided for as long as it has been, and I trust before this session is over there will be provision made for the law being equal in regard to all men in our Territories

Mr. MAGINNIS. I believe it would be impracticable to carry out what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Townsend] suggests. The Indians are not under our civil law.

Mr. CROUNSE. Why are they not under our civil laws?

Mr. MAGINNIS. On account of the system of our Government.

Mr. CROUNSE. By what provisions of the Constitution or of law? Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. MAGINNIS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. By the laws of Congress and the treaties in virtue of which they are placed on their reservations.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If an Indian commits a crime against a white man on a given spot in our Territories our laws punish him. Why should they not punish him if he commits a crime against a red man standing upon the same spot?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have never known the law to punish anything

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is time that the law did so. the gentleman will allow me a moment, I would say that as the law stands now we create a necessity for the Indian to remain a barbarian. As against another Indian he has to be continually armed to protect his home, to protect his little ones, and to protect the property he has. If we will protect him as we protect our white men on the same spot of ground, the Indians may cease to be barbarians and can become agri-ground, the Indians may cease to be barbarians and can become agriculturists as our people are.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from New York cannot be more in favor of a thorough revolution in our whole Indian system than I am, I agree with him in all he says. But I believe it to be true, as has been stated by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the Indians do not kill the buffalo cows.

Mr. TOWNSEND of New York. If they do not kill them now then

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If they do not kill them now, then by this amendment we do them no wrong.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It is often the only mode of support they have to kill those buffaloes for their families. There are many Indians in my Territory who by killing the buffalo, curing the meat, and preserving the robes make a very decent livelihood; and I think it would be extremely unwise to include the Indians in the prohibition. The bill ought to pass as it stands.

Mr. FORT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas,
[Mr. Throckmortox.]

Mr. THROCKMORTON. While the intention of this bill is a good one, I have no doubt in my mind that it is mischievous, and that if it is adopted it will be mischievous in its results. There would be a great deal of difficulty in attempting to enforce a law of this kind. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would work great hardship on large portions of our frontier people who are in the habit of hunting buffaloes not only for food but for amusement.

I think the results of the bill would be bad in another direction. The object of this Government is to gather the Indians together on reservations, and just so long as you have buffaloes, so that they can leave their reservations, either at will or by permission, to hunt buffaloes, so long will the Government find it difficult to keep them on faloes, so long will the Government find it difficult to keep them on their reservations.

Now, sir, there is no question that, so long as there are millions of buffaloes in the West, so long the Indians cannot be controlled, even by the strong arm of the Government. I believe it would be a great step forward in the civilization of the Indians and the preservation of peace on the border if there was not a buffalo in existence.

Now let me refer to another thing which has been brought in by gentlemen on the other side of this question. It is well known by the people on the frontier that the buffaloes do not follow the same trail when they go south as when they go north. Sometimes they travel eastward farther than they do at other seasons of the year, and at such times they interfere with the settlements of the country. When one hundred buffaloes come in a neighborhood where cattle When one hundred buffaloes come in a neighborhood where cattle are raised the immediate result is that they carry the cattle off by a kind of stampede, and thus destroy the property of the people.

But the most mischievous result, if this bill be passed, would be the serious injury it would inflict on the people on the frontier, for citizens will be required to travel one hundred miles from the locality where they reside to the Federal courts for trial. They will be subject to extraordinary expenses in traveling and in making defense.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague will allow me to suggest that the bill as presented does not authorize indictments in the States; it relates as presented does not authorize indictments in the states; it relates only to the Territories, and cannot affect our State.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. But, sir, my knowledge of the affairs in Texas justifies me in making the statement I do: in regard to the Territories, and whenever you pass this bill and it goes into effect, you will find that hundreds and hundreds of the frontier people will be dragged from their distant homes to Federal courts for trial, and subjected to extraordinary expenses in traveling and attending to their cases.

Then there is another thing: this bill refers to female buffaloes. I would like to know how an Indian or hunter, however experienced he may be on the frontier, would be able to determine whether the animal fired at was a female or a male. I have had some experience in that business, and I know the impossibility of it. These buffaloes stampede our cattle and horses by the thousand, trample down the grain fields, destroy thousands of acres at a time, and I say that for the civilization of the Indian and the preservation of peace on our borders the more buffaloes are exterminated the better it will be for borders the more buffaloes are exterminated the better it will be for our country.

Mr. FORT. I desire to demand the previous question, but will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK.]

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I had not proposed to take any part in this discussion, but my mind is so thoroughly convinced of the impolicy of this whole bill that I feel it proper that I should make a few remarks as to the reasons why I dissent from this measure in its entirety. I hope, sir, there is no humanitarian sentimentality that would induce legislation for the protection of the buffalo, and that we shall look at it and treat it as a practical question. The only individuals whose interests seem to be sufficiently provided for and protected by this bill are the Indians. If the theory upon which the Government is now treating the Indians is a proper one, and I am inclined to believe it is the best, the sconer we get rid of the buffalo entirely the better it it is the best, the sooner we get rid of the buffalo entirely the better it will be for the Indian and for the white man too. They are, at most, but game. Men have not been able to domesticate them so as to make them useful in any respect as a domestic animal. They take up as much room and consume as much provender as cattle and horses or any other character of useful domestic animals.

But that is not the only reason why I object to this bill. Just so long as the Indian is permitted to roam over the plains and seek a livelihood by the pursuit of this character of game, the only one that remains now that will subsist him for sixty days, just so long will the difficulty continue of humanizing and civilizing him and making him self-sustaining. Then, so far as he is concerned, if the Government is to feed him, and we now expend an aggregate of over $5,000,000 in his to feed him, and we now expend an aggregate of over $5,000,0001 his behalf, a sum sufficient to feed him sumptuously and clothe him, too, that can only be effectuated by confining him to some district of country where he can be placed under the control of those who will look honestly, faithfully, and efficiently to his welfare and remove the inducement to pursue the buffalo. That will be much more easily effected than it will be if you give him a legislative grant, a kind of prerogative right to go in pursuit of the buffalo of any gender when it suits his

The reports on this subject show that one of the greatest difficul-ties is in restraining the Indian from going on his habitual hunt after buffalo, when he engages in other sports, such as murdering the frontier settlers and robbing them of their property and carrying it off without reference to whether they are friends or foes. They have no appreciation of the moral duties which we recognize as being in every citizen of the country, but pursue the habits of their nature and their custom in taking whatever is within their reach. I hope the entire-bill will be defeated.

Mr. FORT. Allow me a few words in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. HANCOCK.] I understand his position to be that in order to civilize the Indians we must destroy the buffalo. Then why not destroy all the game that roams on his native plains? In other words, that we must in order to civilize the Indian reduce him by starvation, and according to the gentleman's theory we should kill or allow to be killed all the buffalo, that he may no longer indulge in the chase to get food for his little ones.

I will ask him then why not also kill all the deer, the elk, and beau-Why not destroy all other game? Why not destroy all the means of support he gets from nature, in order to reduce him to civilization? In other words, would it not be more humane to take your Army and with red-mouthed cannon sweep the Indian from the earth? If death is the remedy he would administer to the Indian, why not say so and then select the least cruel mode of administering it? Do it in the most humane manner. In the name of humanity and the Christian religion do not resort to starvation as a means. I have no especial sentimentality in my bosom for the Indian; I have no especially friendly feeling for the savage, but I do not desire his destruction. The idea of starving little children is so revolting, I cannot see how a gentleman so kind-hearted as he is known to be, could wish such result. Would such treatment civilize, Christianize, or make the Indian more peaceful? In my judgment it would be more likely to make him savage and warlike.

The experience of the gentleman is no doubt greater than my own, but I cannot understand why we should destroy all his game and natural means of support. Why do we feed the Indians as we do? If we are to civilize them by starvation, why do we feed them? Why do we drive out hundreds and thousands of cattle annually to feed them at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars? I cannot see the logic of my friend from Texas of honorable historic name, [Mr. HANCOCK.] course we leave to the several States the preservation and protecting of the game within their borders. We do not propose to go into the States and legislate on game there, but it does seem to me that upon the prin-ciple of humanity to the Indian alone we ought to preserve the game; preserve what he has rather than to destroy the little he has got. For my part I favor the society which has in view the prevention of cruelty to animals. We ought not to be cruel to the Indian, be he human or animal, and we ought not to be cruel to the poor harmless buffalo. In my judgment this bill has in view and will in a degree effect the preservation of his game in order to make him more peaceful and quiet.

Many of the collisions that have arisen between the whites and the Indians, as I am informed by Army officers who have been stationed in that country and by others, have arisen from hunting parties who have gone there and were engaged in wholesale shooting down and destroying the buffalo which they look upon as their cattle raised up by the Great Spirit for their use; and more or less blood has been shed and sometimes wars have ensued merely because white men have been allowed to go among the Indian's flocks and herds and engage in the indiscriminate slaughter of these brutes.

I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr.

REAGAN. If we propose to act upon this subject as upon others we should act upon the facts as they exist before us, and not attempt to shape the legislation of this country upon undeveloped theories, which have not yet arisen and which we have no reason to believe ever will be developed. For nearly a century we have been trying to civilize the Indians, to teach them habits of industry, the pursuits of agriculture, and a knowledge of the mechanic arts. How far have we succeeded with the full-blooded Indian? Can any one point to any success in inducing them to cultivate the soil, to adopt the habits of civilization, and to follow industrial pursuits as the white race do? Mr. HANCOCK. What does my colleague [Mr. REAGAN] say in reference to the Choctaws and Chickasaws?

Mr. REAGAN. I say this, and I say what all know who know anything about them: that with reference to the mixed races, a few who have been educated have obtained property, and established homes, and cultivated the soil. That is not, however, universal even among the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Cherokees, and the other Indians in the territory west of Arkansas, who are, perhaps, most advauced in civilization. When you come to the great mass of Indians, they are Indians still—living their nomadic life by the hunt and the chase. And indicate from the experience of the part windows that if in the and still—name the by the limit and the classe. And judging from the experience of the past, my judgment is that if in the mercy of Heaven a full-blooded Indian shall still be spared at the end of another one hundred years, he will still be the Indian which God has made him, of nomadic habits and pursuing the chase for a livelihood.

Mr. HANCOCK, What does my colleague say of President Juarez, of Mexico, who is an Indian?

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that President Juarez is a descendant of Indians, as a large number of Mexican people are said to be. But he was an educated man; was not reared as an Indian, but in the habits of civilized life. He was not a fair example by which to illustrate the Indians who roam upon the plains.

But I was going to say this: the Indians are now, as they ever have been, a roving nomadic people, living chiefly upon game and fish. Whether you pass this bill or do not pass it, whether you preserve the buffalo or destroy them, whether you preserve the game upon which they live or destroy it, they will still be Indians. The true policy is the policy of humanity, and if gentlemen will have it so, the policy of sentiment. I do not deny that sentiment as well as reason enters into my consideration of all these questions. Whether you destroy or preserve this game, the Indians will still remain Indians. Is it not right in itself to leave them the benefits which the God of nature has provided for sustaining their existence in the condition in which He has placed them upon the earth?

Besides that, sir, if the Indians could be swept from the continent at one blow—if the Indian race could be annihilated—still the law ought to prevent the willful, wanton destruction of so large a mass of cattle, (as they may be termed,) well suited for human food, and whose hides, horns, &c., are valuable as articles of commerce. They ought to be preserved against the wanton destruction which has fallen under the observation of all who have had experience in the buffale range and upon the frontiers. Even if the Indians were out of the way, I should be in favor of preventing the wanton destruction of these large herds of cattle which are so valuable for food and other It is unwise, it is wrong, it is cruel to permit men to indulge in the wanton destruction of animals which are of so great value to any part of the human family brought into contact with them.

Mr. FORT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] to offer an amendment; and then I shall ask the House to sustain the

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, from more than two years' experience on the western plains, I feel thoroughly persuaded of the propriety of the legislation now proposed, and I shall give it my hearty approval. But, in order to obviate one difficulty which I perceive in connection with the measure, I wish to offer an amendment; and I hope the gentleman who has control of the floor will permit me to submit one word of explanation with reference to the purpose of the amendment

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Blackburn.) Does the gentleman offer an amendment to the amendment already pending ?
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. An amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman offer it as a substitute for the pending amendment?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Yes, sir, I will offer it as a substitute. It is to insert the following proviso:

Provided, What any white person who shall employ, hire, or procure, directly or indirectly, any Indian to kill any buffalo forbidden to be killed by this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished in the manner provided in this act.

I wish to say but a few words in reference to this amendment. One great source of the destruction of the buffalo, according to my observation, is the fact that white people who are interested in procuring the pelts of the buffalo employ the Indians for the purpose of destroying this species of game; and, if the bill now pending should in its present form become a law, the temptation to employ Indians for this purpose would in my judgment be infinitely increased. In order to prevent the defeat or evasion of the law by the employment of Indians for the purpose of destroying this class of game, some such amendment as I propose should be inserted.

Mr. FORT. If I did not understand that the bill already covers the content of the purpose of the content of the purpose of the purpose should be inserted.

the object proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Baker] I should certainly be in favor of it; but it seems to me that the bill already would include such cases and punish them. If members will turn to line 5 of the second section of the bill they will find the bill provides that-

It shall be in like manner unlawful for any such person or persons to assist or be in any manner engaged or concerned in or about such unlawful killing, wounding, or destroying of any such buffaloes.

It seems to me that under this provision, if a white man should employ Indians to wantonly slaughter buffalo, he would be concerned directly in such slaughter and would be liable to the penalty provided by the bill.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jenks] to offer an amendment; and after that, if I have any time left, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. JENKS. I desire to offer the following amendment:

Strike out in the fourth line of the second section the word "can" and insert "shall;" and in the second line of the same section insert the word "wantonly" before "kill;" so that the clause will read:

That it shall be, in like manner, unlawful for any such person to wantonly kill, wound, or destroy in said Territories any greater number of male buffaloes than are needed for food by such person or than shall be used, cured, or preserved for the food of other persons or for the market.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An amendment of this character is not now in order; but, if there be no objection, it will be received. There was no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. FORT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill contains some provisions which I desire to oppose, as I have done on every former occasion when it has been presented. In the first place, I am opposed to giving to the Indians, while it is the policy of the Government to confine them upon their reservations closely, any inducement to wander from those reservations throughout the Territories in hunt of game or for the munder of the people.

Again, I am opposed by a law of the United States to giving to Indians a privilege which is not given to the citizen of white blood who has gone into the wilderness to make his home there, to settle there, to bring up his family there. I say it presents a strange spectacle to the people of the United States and to the people of the world for Cougress to legislate that the rude, wild, savage Indian may kill buffalo on the territories of the people of the United States when the white man, even to support his starving family, shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment for doing the same thing.

Now, this first section provides that it shall be unlawful for any person who is not an Indian to kill, wound, or in any way destroy any female buffalo of any age found at large within the borders of any of the Territories of the United States. Why should we lay the ban upon the Territories of the United States. Why should we lay the ban upon the white citizen who may be starving, or whose family may be starving, to prevent his killing a buffalo of any sex for the support of his family? Yet that is what is proposed by this law. If it shall meet with support of gentlemen here it will meet a support which it has never met with before in this House. I think the whole bill is unwise. I think it is a useless measure. I think the annihilation of the buffalo is not only predestinated, but a necessity to the successful cultivation of the soil of the western Territories, and one of the first and super measures to prevent the wandering of savagratiles in their results. surest measures to prevent the wandering of savage tribes in their predatory excursions among the whites who dwell in our Territories.

I will not detain the House longer, as the gentleman having charge of the bill requests me to confine myself to a brief moment. My objections are not new found against this bill. It has been sprung on this House in favor of the Indians and against the settlers at almost every session of Congress for the last six years and as often defeated. I hope it will be again.

Mr. FORT. There are great difficulties in the way of providing regulations for the Indians in the killing of buffalo; that the gentle regulations for the Indians in the killing of buffalo; that the gentleman knows. Because of treaties there are difficulties in the way which cannot well be handled in a bill like this. Yet whenever it shall be found that Indians go out in parties wantonly to destroy these animals, then I think the people of the United States, people of the gentleman's own color, will be willing to regulate the Indians as well as white men. If the white man cannot hold his own against the Indian in the Territories I think it is quite time he should retreat.

Mr. CONGER. He can perhaps in Congress, although he may not

Mr. CONGER. He can pernaps in Congress, although he may not be able to do so on the plains.

Mr. FORT. This idea about preferring Indians to white men is all "bosh," and the gentleman knows it. He makes the objection for that purpose. Why do we not drive thousands of hear of cattle to the gentleman's own district to feed them out to his white constituents? Why do we not do't! We do it to the Indians, and he knows it. There is greated legislation by Congress which he reference to it. There is special legislation by Congress which has reference to the Indians and not to white men.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman knows in my district we have the best herds of cattle in the United States.

Mr. FORT. I now demand the previous question on the bill and

Mr. HUNTON. I do not propose to detain the committee by any lengthy remarks upon the subject-matter of this bill. I take it, sir, that every member of this House has been spoken to, in language stronger and more eloquent than I can employ, by the survivors of the war of 1812 who live within their districts. And I shall not detain the committee at any length, for the further consideration that during the last Congress a bill very-similar in its provisions to the bill now under consideration was passed with great unanimity through this House

The points in this bill which make a radical change in the law of pensions of the war of 1812 are only three in number, and I shall briefly call the attention of the committee to these three points. The bill is a bill amending the law passed on the 14th of February 1871, granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812. The main provision of that law, which is proposed to be amended by the bill now under consideration, is that all soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 who served sixty days and had an honorable discharge should be entitled to a pension of $8 per month, and that the widows of soldiers who served for sixty days should have the like pension, provided they were married prior to the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States. This bill provides that the soldiers and sailors who served for the period of ten days shall be entitled to that pen-sion, thus limiting the service required to entitle the surviving soldier to a pension—reducing it from sixty days to a period of ten days. The bill under consideration also gives a pension to the widows of such soldiers where they married prior to the year 1850.

The next point of importance in this bill is a repeal of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes. During the war a resolution was passed through Congress, and is embodied in that section of the Revised Statutes, in the following words:

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

The bill under consideration repeals that section, and restores to the pension-roll the persons who were entitled to pensions under for-mer laws and who were stricken from the rolls or their pay suspended by reason of their inability to prove a want of sympathy with the late

These are the three leading points in this bill, which is amendatory of the act of 1871, and I think they will commend themselves to the favorable consideration of the committee. These soldiers of the war ravorable consideration of the committee. These soldiers of the war of 1812 are poor in the main, all of them are old, and very many of them infirm, and it is certainly time that the Government of the United States had done justice in recognizing the services of these soldiers in the part they performed in the war of 1812. These soldiers are rapidly passing away, and if the Government means to do anything in recognition of their valuable services in the war of 1812 it is time now to do it. it is time now to do it.

I have before me the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the past year. He says of the survivors of the war of 1812:

On the 30th of June, 1874, the number borne upon this roll was 17,620, at a total annual rate of $1,691,520. During the past year 241 names were added to this roll, and 1,986 were lost by death, leaving a net roll, June 30, 1875, of 15,875, at a total annual rate of $1,524,000, a decrease for the year of 1,745 pensioners, and of $167,525 in the aggregate annual amount paid to this class.

Of the widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812 he says:

This roll numbered on the 30th of June, 1874, 5,312, at a total annual rate of $509,952. During the past fiscal year 416 names were added to the roll, but it lost by death 565, leaving upon it June 30, 1875, the names of 5,163 pensioners, at a total annual rate of $495,648, a decrease for the year of 149 in the number, and of $14,334 in the amount of pensions of this class.

So that it will appear, Mr. Chairman, that these soldiers and their widows are rapidly passing away, and, according to this report of the Commissioner of Pensions, one-tenth having died in the last year, in ten years it may be expected that the last one of the soldiers and their widows will have passed away. I ask, therefore, in view of this fact, and the further fact that might be stated here, that the number of deaths in proportion to the whole number is increasing year by ear-in view of these facts I ask that the House pass at once this bill to do justice at last to the soldiers of 1812.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee further, and I ask that by unanimous consent we proceed to consider this bill section by section under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KASSON. I should be glad if the gentleman would state be-fore he sits down if he has an estimate from the Pension Office of the probable amount of additional compensation that will be paid under

Mr. HUNTON. I have, sir, and I will send it to the desk to be read.
Mr. KASSON. I shall be glad to hear it.
Mr. HUNTON. I may mention further that in the estimate here of the payment of pensions from the 14th of February, 1871, making a very large sum, the bill under consideration gives no back pensions.

It gives pensions from the date of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the paper which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Hunton] has sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your personal inquiry of recent date as to the probable number of additions to the pension-roll would follow such amendment to the act of February 14, 1871, (section 4736 Revised Statutes,) as would admit thereto all soldiers of the war of 1812 who served ten days and the widows of such soldiers married prior to the year 1850, also the number of former pensioners who would be restored to the rolls by the repeal of all provisions of pension law relating to disloyalty, and the annual amount of increase to the roll which would be caused by all the above modifications, I have the honor to report as follows:

From calculations and estimates based upon such data as can be procured, it is believed that by reducing the required term of service to ten days the number of survivors of the war of 1812 added to the roll would be fifty-six hundred and eighty, and (the date of marriage remaining as now provided by law) the number of widows sixteen hundred and twenty.

This Office is in possession of no data which afford any very reliable basis for calculating the number of widows (war of 1812) who would be added to the roll were the existing laws modified as to admit all those married prior to 1850, but the number is estimated at about fifteen thousand.

Thus the whole estimated number of survivors and widows which would be 22,300, and the amount per year required to pay this number (at the present rate of $8 per month) would be $2,140,800.

If such pensions were by the proposed amendment allowed to commence from February 14, 1871, the date at which all pensions under that act now commence, the amount of arrears due at first payment would be—say from February 14, 1871, to February 14, 1876.—$10,504,000.

In relation to the inquiry as to the number of former pensioners whose names would probably be restored to the roll upon the repeal of the present law as to loyalty, I have to state that the records o

H. M. ATKINSON, Commissioner.

Hon. EFPA HUNTON, Chairman Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812,

Mr. KASSON. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to one other question. In listening to the reading of that report or letter, so far as I could observe, there is no statement of one item of disbursement, namely, that which relates to the pensions which will be paid as arrearages to the minors of those who had died pending their disability to draw their pensions.

Mr. HUNTON. No, there is no estimate of that; but it would amount to almost nothing.

Mr. KASSON. Is there no estimate?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; no estimate of that.

Mr. KASSON. The bill, I believe, provides that, although the pensioners have died, whatever would have been due to them or paid to them shall go to their heirs and that item I did not been mentioned. to them shall go to their heirs, and that item I did not hear mentioned in this letter.

Mr. HUNTON. In that event the arrearages of pensions would go to the surviving widow; if she were dead, to the minor children; and, if there were no children, then it would not be paid at all.

Mr. KASSIN. So then there remains to be added to the items the entire amount that would have been paid if the law had gone on uninterruptedly during the rebellion, and that entire amount has to be metapterity during the resemble, and that earlier amount has to be paid to the representatives of the deceased pensioners.

Mr. HUNTON. It has.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question; it is whether the committee considered the propriety of including the survivors and their widows who served in the Indian wars?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; that question is before the committee in a separate bill, and was not considered in connection with this bill at all.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. If I understand him correctly these arrearages to pensioners are to be given to those who had pensions under the law?

Mr. HUNTON. If this bill passes repealing that section of the Revised Statutes any soldier who served and whose name was stricken from the roll in obedience to that section would be restored to the rolls and receive his pension from the time he was dropped from the rolls; and, if he has died, then the widow gets the arrearages; if there is no widow, then the minor children get them; and, if there are no minor children, the arrearages are not paid at all.

Mr. EDEN. He gets then his pension as if it had never been drop-

Mr. EDEX. He gets then his pension as it is not never been dropped from the rolls at all, so far as the amount is concerned.
Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered by sections under the five-minute rule. Some gentlemen desire to offer amendments, and they will come in better by considering the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered. The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, &c., approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, including militia and volunteers, of the military and naval service of the United States, who served for ten days in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and werehonorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men: Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1850 to such officer or enlisted or drafted men.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out in line 11 the word "ten" and inserting in lieu thereof "five," so that the time required for service shall be five days instead of ten days. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that if we are to pass a bill giving relief to the soldiers of the war of 1812 the bill should embrace if possible every man now entitled to pension who has served in that war. The law of 1871 provided for sixty days' service and there were a great many men scattered all over the country who had served fifty, fifty-five, and even some fifty-nine days. I have in my mind a man in my own district who served fifty-nine days, and by the restriction of that legislation is not entitled to a pension under it.

Now, I would remove that restriction just as far as possible.

this country who served in the war of 1812 for nine days only, then he will be excluded by the provisions of this bill; or, if he served five days only, he will be excluded from the provisions of this bill. Let us bring it down to the very lowest possible time of service and still protect the Government. It may be necessary that a limitation should be put as to the time of service for the reason that frauds may be practiced upon the Government unless some time of service should be required.

For my own part, sir, I should desire that every soldier who served in the war of 1812, who was even in the service for a day, should receive a pension; but I believe there is some force in the proposition that some limitation of time is required to prevent frauds on the Government. I propose therefore to reduce the time to the lowest possible time, which in my judgment is five days; and, as I before said, if there is no soldier who served less than ten days, of course the amendment can do no harm; but, if there is one single soldier who enlisted or was drafted into the service and who served for the period of less than ten days, then I submit that our legislation should reach him for his benefit, and therefore I hope that there will be no objection to the amendment, so that every person who served in the war for five days may receive the benefits of this bill.

Mr. DE BOLT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "one."
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The object of the committee which reported this bill, in putting in the limitation of ten days, was this: The pension laws heretofore enacted have had very stringent provisions in regard to proof. The applicant must show a muster-roll; he must show this and that and many things by two witnesses. Sometimes he was required to show services by two persons serving in the same company, in order to protect the Government. The committee have so modified the law by this bill as to allow any satisfactory proof, whether he was really a law to really a superior of the same company. whether by muster-roll or by personal recollection, or by the state-ments of a person who saw the soldier in the service; any evidence of that character has been allowed, if it is of a satisfactory nature.

of that character has been allowed, if it is of a satisfactory nature. The object of the committee was not to put any burden upon any soldier who had faithfully served his country. The object was, in the looseness of the testimony which the bill permits to be given, to protect the Government against every possible imposition. It would be a crime to intimate that any old man could intentionally do a wrong, and especially one who had served his country faithfully in the war of 1812 and 1815. But we feared the pension agents; we feared that interested men would get somebody to swear to something that would draw a pension from the Government. Therefore, as we could not by conversation about this House, by examining the applications for special laws, find that anybody had ever applied for a pension who had served less than ten days, we fixed the limitation of ten days.

Now, if the humanity of the House, if the patriotism of the House shall be such as to lead members to believe that it is better to remove shall be such as to lead members to believe that it is better to remove that restriction, it doubtless will be satisfactory to the committee. I, for one, certainly shall be abundantly satisfied. I content myself with for one, certainly shall be abundantly satisfied. explaining the reason which operated upon the minds of the committee in putting on the restriction of ten days, when they have so opened the field of proof that any satisfactory evidence will be sufficient to place a man upon the pension-roll.

Mr. DE BOLT. In answer to my friend from New York [Mr. Town-SEND ] I would say that the same record evidence exists to prove that a man was in the service, who was there but one day, that exists to prove that he was in the service at all, either for five days or for ten days.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We do not require any record evidence.

Mr. DE BOLT. The same testimony exists for proving service of one day as for proving five or ten days

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. DE BOLT to reduce the time to one day.

Mr. DE BOLT. I will withdraw that amendment if my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] will renew it.

Mr. BOONE. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying this: I do not see that the same fraud might not be purpose of saying this: I do not see that the same fraud might not be practiced by the pension agent with reference to a man who had been in the service for six months as could be practiced with reference to a man who had served but ten days. If there is record evidence of a man's having served in the Army at all, that record is just as good to verify ten days' service as six months' service. If there be no record evidence, and evidence of another character must be relied upon, it seems to me just as easy to manufacture evidence to prove six months' service as to prove five days' service. Therefore I cannot see that there is any more liability of fraud being practiced upon the Government in the one case than in the other.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the law ought to be so There can be no reasonable doubt that the law ought to be so amended as to admit to the pension-rolls every man who served his country as a soldier in the war of 1812 for any length of time whatever. The giving a soldier a mere pittance for his services in the way of a pension, as I understand it, is simply a recognition of that patriotism which took him from his home and his family and led him to take up arms in defense of the flag of his country. It does not pay him for the time lost; it does not pay him for the privations he had to undergo; it does not pay him for the blood perchance that he may have shed upon the battle-field. It is simply a recognition upon the part of the Government of that valor and patriotism which called the honor, the glory, and the flag of their country.

If that was the motive which called a single man from the endearments of home, whether for one day or for six months, it seems to me that, if the Government is going to recognize at all the services of such a man, that recognition is just as much due to the man who served for five days as to the man who served for six months. There is in my district, and I have him in my mind's eye now, a poor old soldier of the war of 1812 who was in the service for twenty-nine days. In con-sequence of the privations he had to endure he is now blind; he is a cripple, bereft of all earthly goods whatever, and in fact a beggar, dependent upon the charity of the people. And yet that man, whose devotion to his country was manifested in as high a degree as that of the man who served for six months, has never yet received a dollar from the Government in recognition of those services. The sum of $8 per month to him would be a small sum in the opinion of the man who gets $5,000 a year for his services.

But $8 a month to a man in his situation is the means of a great

But $8 a month to a man in his situation is the means of a great comfort, or at least the means of supplying great necessities.

I do think that as a matter of simple justice these old men, nearly all of whom are gone to the valley of death, and those left are rapidly going, so that in a few years the tolling bell will sound the death-note of the last one of them—it does seem to me that these men in their declining years should have recognition by the General Government of their services in the field, at least to the extent of giving them this poor pittance of $8 a month.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to say only a few words in regard to the amendment to the amendment. I have not the slightest objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] nor indeed to that of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOONE;] but it was considered in the committee that reported the bill that, unless there considered in the committee that reported the bill that, unless there should be some limitation, some time of service specified, the door would be opened to fraudulent proof of service for perhaps an hour, or twenty-four hours, and that thus the Government might be defrauded, for gentlemen will find by looking at the third section that proof of service is not confined to record evidence. The provision is—

The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge, the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony.

Now the committee thought that, unless some term of service were designated in the bill, a door would be opened to fraudulent proof of service for a day or any other very short period. It was for this reason alone that the committee adopted the rule requiring ten days' service I would have no objection to five days; but I submit that one day's service is too short to entitle a soldier to a pension, for the reason which I have stated.

The question being taken on Mr. BOONE's amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hoskins, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 33, noes not counted.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Hoskins to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read "who served for five days in the war with Great Britain of 1812."

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. If it be germane to the amendment, it will be in

Mr.JAMESB. REILLY. I move to amend by striking out altogether the words "for ten days" in the eleventh line of the first section; so that the clause will read "who served in the war with Great Britain of 1812."

I agree most heartily in the language of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Boone,] and I do not think it becoming that this body in enacting a law for the benefit of those who gave their services for the country should make any discrimination as to the length of the service. While there may be apprehensions that frauds will be practiced, yet if any limit of time be fixed—ten days, five days, or even one day—it may be the means of preventing meritorious and just claimants from securing the benefits of this act. If there is any apprehension of fraud, I submit that the proper way to guard against apprehension of fraud, I submit that the proper way to guard against it is not by a limitation of this kind, but by inserting such restrictions in regard to evidence as may be the means of preventing fraud. And I notice that the committee seem to have had this in view, because in the third section they have provided certain forms and regulations in accordance with which applications are to be made. I think it better to rely upon the proper Department of the Government who will have control of the execution of this law to carry out measures for the prevention of fraud rather than to insert a limitation of this kind, which may be the means of excluding meritorious claimants. For these reasons I hope the House will adopt the amendment I have

I submit that the question on my amendment must be first put, as it is in the nature of a motion to perfect the paragraph. If the words be stricken out, of course my amendment fails. Where there is an original amendment pending and an amendment is moved in the nature of a substitute, the original amendment must be first put in order to perfect the original paragraph before action is taken on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair the point of order made by the gentleman from New York is not well taken. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is germane to the amendment already pending.

Mr. HOSKINS. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, then I ask the Chair, with all due respect for his ruling, how it will be possible for the House to reach my amendment? The language to which it applies will have been stricken out.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. Clymer having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, announcing that that body had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 140) for the relief of B. P. Patterson; and An act (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding the terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia.

It further announced that the President had notified that body that he had, on February 18, approved and signed bills of the following titles,

An act (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada; and An act (S. No. 305) to change the location of the consulates at Aixla-Chapelle and at Omoa and Truxillo.

THE WAR OF 1812.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend the first section of the bill by inserting in line 9 after the words "drafted men" the word "teamsters," and to insert the same word in the thirteenth line,

I do this because I understand the rule of the Pension Bureau, under the law of February 14, 1871, excludes this class of men who served in the war of 1812. The Pension Bureau, in other words, has construed the law not to include that character of service. In the law passed granting a bounty to the soldiers of the war of 1812 teamsters were included, and all persons who served in the war of 1812, whether as drafted men, volunteers, or teamsters, received bounty under that law. Yet under the pension law of 1871 teamsters were excluded by construction of the Bureau, because it was decided at the Pension Office they were not included under the provisions of that enactment. I suppose this class of persons who served in the war of enactment. I suppose this class of persons who served in the war of 1812 are entitled to the same recognition as those who served in any other line of duty. I have therefore moved the amendment so that the provisions of this bill shall cover teamsters as well as drafted men.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 44, noes 53. The CHAIRMAN. No further count being demanded, the amendment is rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I move to insert after the word "twelve" in line 12, these words: "Or in any of the battles with the Indians during the year 1811."

The bill as it now stands cuts off all those engaged in the Indian war of 1811, even at the battle of Tippecanoe, who may now survive. My amendment, if adopted, will include those who served in any of the battles with the Indians during the year 1811, and that they shall be paid the same as those who served in the war of 1812. There are but few survivors of those Indian battles. There are but few survivors in Indiana of those Indian battles, and I presume there are some in Kentucky who were engaged in the battle of Tippecanoe and who have as good a right for meritorious services to be included in the provisions of this bill as any who served in the war of 1812. I hope the amendment will be adopted and this class of citizens will be included.

Mr. HUNTON. The bill under consideration by the committee is a pension bill for the soldiers of the war of 1812. I believe if the soldiers of any other war be included it will kill it. If the gentleman from Indiana desires a pension bill for the soldiers of Indian wars, let him introduce it and have it referred to the Committee on Pensions, and it will be properly considered and acted on. Why should we now weaken this bill by including provisions for those who served in other wars?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. There are very few survivors of those who served in Indian battles during the year 1811, and certainly they will not weaken, but on the contrary will give strength to this bill. The most of them are in the States of Indiana and Kentucky; and why, the most of them are in the States of Indiana and Kentucky; and why, the states of Indiana and Kentucky; and why the states of Indiana and Kentucky; and the states of India let me ask, should they be deprived of pension when it is given to those who served for twenty, thirty, or forty days in the war of 1812? There are few survivors of those Indian battles, and I trust provision will be made to give them pensions.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 74.

The CHAIRMAN. No further count being demanded, the amendment is rejected.

Mr. CABELL. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out lines 14, 15, and 16, and inserting "without reference to the time at which said widows were married to such officers and enlisted or drafted men."

The bill as it reads now provides that such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1850 to such officers, enlisted, or drafted men. I propose to insert in lieu thereof "without reference to the time such widows were married to such officers, enlisted, or drafted men." sume it is the disposition of Congress to pension these soldiers in consideration of the service they rendered, and to give to the widows they have left behind them some recognition of the valuable services these old soldiers rendered to their country. If that is so, I see no reason why the widows of those old soldiers should not be pensioned notwithstanding the fact they were married since 1850. It seems to me that if pensions are to be given in consideration of the services of old soldiers no good reasons exist why we should not as well recognize the widows of those who were married since 1850 as those who were married prior to that time.

Some gentlemen say we will place upon the rolls some young ladies who married these old veterans. Even let that be the case, I care not for it. It may place a few more on the rolls if such be the fact. I take it for granted very few persons will be found of that character who have married these old veterans merely for the purpose of getting pensions. If justice is to be done so tardily to these people, I say let it be given to the widows of those who married since 1850 as well as those who married before. There are many cases no doubt in the United States where the parties were married since 1850. Twenty-six long years ago is that date, 1850; and many of these persons have been married I have no doubt since that time. Perhaps some of these veterans may have married from the necessity of having some one to take eare of them. I think the widows should have this pension in consideration of the services of their husbands though they have been married since 1850.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

I had the honor last session of Congress of sitting upon the Commit tee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812, of which I am still a member. We reported a bill last session. We thought it was a lib-eral bill. This House in its extreme liberality amended that bill fureral bill. This House in its extreme liberality amended that bill further than the committee had thought proper. It passed this House and went to the Senate and there it sleeps. And if gentlemen persist in putting amendments on this bill, the object they have and which we all have in passing this bill, and having it become a law, will be defeated. There is such a thing, Mr. Chairman, as requiring to be saved from one's friends. Here is a bill that is liberal in all its terms, and as liberal as we can expect it to be if it is to become a law. The chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812 has time after time endeavored to get this bill before the House. It is before it this evening. But if we go to work and talk this bill to death or load it with amendments and defeat it in that way, we shall have accomplished that which we do not desire.

I hope that gentlemen in considering this bill will consider its liberality. Let us go to work and pass it and send it to the Senate instead of talking it to death in this House.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] a question. It is simply what reason actuated the committee in inserting a provise of this character?

mittee in inserting a proviso of this character?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, as the law now stands it is required that such widows shall have been married before 1815; and I presume there were good reasons for that law. There are several reasons for this. One is to discourage this idea of young girls marrying old men simply for the sake of drawing a pension.

Mr. HARRISON. I would ask the gentleman whether probably some of these old men who have lived so many years without assistance from the Government may not have been compelled to marry some industrious young women to aid them in getting the livelihood which the Government, refused to give them. If the young women have married these old men and taken care of them till they died, I think they are entitled to a recompense from the Government for having taken care of its maimed and wounded soldiers.

Mr. CABELL. I had no idea of seeking to delay this bill, and I am sorry that any gentleman on this floor should consider that I was disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of a bill which I regard in the light almost of a necessity to the country.

In objecting to my amendment, the only reason given by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] for the provise which I propose to strike out is that there is a similar proviso in a bill prior to this one. If that is the case, it is no good reason why this proviso should have a place in this bill. My amendment simply goes to striking out the a place in this bill. My amendment simply goes to striking out the three last lines of the first section. If these are stricken out exact justice will be done to the widows of these old soldiers. The gentleman from Missouri says that these young women have married old soldiers—for what I cannot see.

Mr. BLAND. To get a pension.

Mr. CABELL. It seems to me that if the ladies, if the young damsels in the country of that distinguished gentleman, will for the pittance of $8 per month marry old men, I think he has a different character of women in his country from those found in mine. Nothing of acter of women in his country from those found in mine. Nothing of that sort I imagine has been done. But if it be true that these ladies have married old pensioners for the sake of this little pension, then, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Harrison] says, they ought to be paid by the Government for taking care of its old soldiers.

And the gentleman does not seem to consider that these old veter-ans may have married some old veteran ladies who ought to be taken care of. I think in view of all the facts of the case no good purpose can be subserved by leaving this proviso in the bill, while many good purposes may be subserved and justice substantially done by striking it out and leaving the section to close at the end of the thirteenth line.

The question being taken on Mr. Cabell's amendment, it was agreed

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "twelve" in the twelfth line of the first section insert the following words:

"Or was engaged in the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811."

The amendment was not agreed to. The following section was read:

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $\frac{3}{2}$ per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $\frac{3}{2}$ per month except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $\frac{3}{2}$ per month) and $\frac{3}{2}$ per month. Pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $\frac{3}{2}$ per month, except as herein provided, and shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto from and after the passage of this act for and during their natural lives: Provided, That the pensions to widows provided for in this act shall cease when they shall marry again.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend by striking out the proviso at the end of the section.

My reason, Mr. Chairman, for offering this amendment is that there are a number of widows who have been married and their husbands are now dead, and they are more needy than they were at the time their original husbands died or were killed in the war. There cannot be a large number of these, but I have two, at least, in my mind's eye who are more needy now than they were when their original hus-who are more neety now than they were when their original husbands died. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBELL. Is it husbands they need? [Laughter.]
Mr. WHITE. This provise is that the pensions to widows provided in this act shall cease when they marry again. Now, Mr. Chairman, it may happen that some good-looking widow directly after the war of 1812 married again and that husband is dead; she is a widow again; she is more needy now than she ever was before. [Laughter.]
A gentleman in my rear asks me if these ladies are in need of husbands. [Laughter.] Now, one of these ladies would say that while she may be in need of a husband she is more in need of something else. [Laughter.] I ask for a vote upon my amendment striking out the proviso.

Mr. HUBBELL. I certainly hope the gentleman from Kentucky will further explain this matter. I am sure the House does not understand what these widows need.

The question was taken on Mr. White's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the third section of the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the third section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 3. That, before the name of any person shall be placed upon the pension-rolls under this act, proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under this act; and any person who shall falsely take any oath required to be taken under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of perjury. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the rolls the names of any persons when it shall appear, by proof satisfactory to him, that such names were put on said rolls by or through false or fraudulent representations as to the right of such persons to a pension under this act. The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the said war of 1812, such grant shall be prima face evidence of his service and honorable discharge, so as to entitle him, if living, or his widow, if he be dead, to a pension under this act. But such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land warrant was improperly granted.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill whether in line 19 at the commencement of the proviso, after the word "person," the words "or his widow" should not be inserted, because it may well have happened that the land warrant provided for here as a basis of evidence was granted to the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, instead of to the soldier himself. I move that those words be inserted. As the section now stands it only applies in a case where a land warrant has been issued to the person performing the services. It should apply both to the case of a land warrant is-

Mr. HALE. I think a little examination will show the gentleman that it is necessary.

Mr. HUNTON. It reads now:

Provided, That when any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the said war of 1812, such grant shall be prima facte evidence of his service and honorable discharge.

Now if a land warrant was granted either to a soldier himself or to his widow it was on account of the services of the soldier.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but is there not a doubt, unless you put in the words I have suggested, whether the department will not construe it words I have suggested, whether the department will not construe it so as only to apply to those warrants issued to the person serving, because these words follow: "so as to entitle him if living,"

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, "so as to entitle him if living, or his widow if he be dead." I do not, however, see the slightest objection to the amendment, although I think it needless.

Mr. HARRISON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine whether these land warrants were not issued sometimes to the heirs instead of to the widow, and should not the language be "the widow or heirs?"

Mr. HALE. Then I would have both words put in, so as to read "any person, his widow or his heirs." I offer the amendment only for the purpose of making the bill more perfect.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to the amendment, but I think . it needless.

The question was taken on Mr. Hale's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the fifth section, as follows:

The Clerk read the fifth section, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service of the war of 1812 against Great Britain, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so far modified as to authorize the payment of claimants under this act; and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States is hereby repealed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend that section by inserting after the words "Great Britain" in line 5 the words "and widows of soldiers of the revolutionary war."

This section proposes to restore widows of soldiers of the war of 1812 whose names were stricken from the rolls for disloyalty under the act of 1862. I propose to add "and widows of soldiers of the rev-olutionary war." There is still one living to my knowledge, and there may be more, and I suppose there will be no objection to inserting the words.

Mr. DE BOLT. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment as a substitute for it. It is to amend section 5 by striking out of lines 4 and 5 the following:

On account of service of the war of 1812 against Great Britain.

I offer this amendment because the bill as it now stands only applies to the pensions of those soldiers who were engaged in the war with Great Britain in 1812. Now by striking out these words it leaves the section entirely open so as to reach revolutionary soldiers and soldiers in the war with Mexico. I know a number of soldiers and soldiers in the war who have been stricken from the roll and who ought to be restored, and by this amendment they will be restored. I also know that there are some widows of soldiers who were killed in battle in the Mexican war who have been stricken from the rolls and ought to be restored. Pensions have been granted to soldiers of the Mexican war, and this only applies to those who have heretofore been granted.
The reading of the bill will show that.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment will be in order, except by unanimous consent, to be received and considered as pending.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask that unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTON. Unless the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Baker] is germane to the one now pending, I would prefer that it be postponed until the pending amendment shall have been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HUNTON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not before the committee.

Mr. HUNTON. In regard to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] and the substitute for it offered by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. De Boll, ] I will say that the substitute meets my views entirely. I think it is entirely proper that the words referred to should be stricken from the section, that is, "on account of service of the war of 1812 against Great Britain;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will accept the substitute in place of my amendment. Mr. HUNTON. Mr. HUNTON. The committee will observe that this fifth section of the bill was designed to affect only the pensions upon the invalid-pension list, which may be of soldiers of the revolutionary war or their pension list, which may be of soldiers of the revolutionary war or their widows, soldiers of the Indian wars, of the war of 1812, or of the Mexican war. I am sure the design of the committee was to embrace all the soldiers of all those wars. By an oversight these words were inserted, and I trust they will be stricken out.

The amendment of Mr. DE Bolt was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to strike out section 5 as amended.

Mr. CASWELL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] by striking out of section 5 all the latter portion of the bill as follows:

latter portion of the bill, as follows:

And that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment, by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1567, be, and the same is bereby, so far modified as to authorize the payment of claimants under this act; and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States is hereby repealed.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That no money shall be paid any one on account of arrears during the term of his disability.

The object of my amendment is this: I would not oppose restoring to the pension-rolls the names of those stricken from it on account of their disloyalty to the Government; I am in favor of their being now added to the list. But I am opposed to that portion of the bill which provides that the amount in arrears shall be paid to them. We have

The gentlemen in charge of this bill can give us no estimate whatever of the amount of money which would be taken from the Treasury for that purpose. I do not propose to take this step in the dark without an estimate. I am in favor of so amending the bill that the names of those stricken from the pension rolls for disloyalty shall be restored, but that no arrears of pensions during the period of their disloyalty shall be paid to them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment by adding to the proviso "except widows of revolutionary soldiers."

Mr. CASWELL. I raise the point of order that no further amendment is now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As I understand it, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] is an amendment to the text of the bill, and therefore in the first degree, and open to

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Caswell] to move his amendment as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then I raise the point of order that it is not pertinent, because the motion of the gentleman from Indiana

Is not pertinent, because the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Baker] is to strike out the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. CASWELL. Then I offer my amendment as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] that under the rule the amendment offered by him would take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Baker,] as it is within the power of the House to perfect the section before taking the question upon the motion to strike it out.

the section before taking the question upon the motion to strike it out.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then my amendment to his amendment would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I then move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Caswell] by adding to the proviso which he has offered the words "except widows of revolu-proviso which he has offered the words "except widows of revolutionary pensioners."

Mr. CASWELL. I accept the amendment to my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the gentleman include all widows?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have no objection; but I am opposed to the amendment in toto, and shall vote against it even if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAR-

Mr. CASWELL. Not by any means. I am afraid the widows will be more numerous than the soldiers.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] said that we could get no information as to the amount of money this section would take from the Treasury. I submit that if he had listened to the reading of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, as read by the Clerk, he would have seen that a full statement was there made. In the first place, the Commissioner gives the number dropped and the number that would be restored by this act, and distinguishes between the naval and land service, between the soldiers tinguishes between the naval and land service, between the soldiers and the widows. The annual amount required by their restoration would be $5,616. Then comes a summary of the pensioners to be restored and the annual amount required for their payment, including naval pensions, half-pay, widows, and invalid pensions. The total number to be restored to the rolls is four hundred and fifty, and their annual pay would be $39,658. The amount that it would take to pay the arrearages is not given by the Commissioner of Pensions,

Mr. CASWELL. The amount per annum is given, not the sum total.

Mr. HUNTON. That is true. But the amount cannot be large. It is diminishing year by year. Where the soldier is dead, his widow gets it; if the widow is dead, the minor child or children get it; if no minor child or children survive, nobody gets it. It is not a large mat-

These parties who have been dropped from the rolls because of their supposed participation in the late civil war had really no concern in that war; they were all too old. However much they might have been disposed to join in the war against the Government of the United States, they had passed the age at which they could render any serv-ice. I think it therefore a matter of propriety and justice that those who have thus been dropped from the rolls should be restored and receive their arrearages of pension.

Mr. CASWELL. If there was any reason for striking them from the rolls at all, that reason still exists; and for us to say that we will pay this money from the time they were stricken from the rolls is to pay this money from the time they were stricken from the rolls is to say that the Congress which passed that law authorizing their names to be dropped did wrong; did that which it never should have done. At any period from that time to the present day Congress could have restored the names of these persons to the pension-rolls; but it has never seen fit to do so. I am ready to join hands with other gentlemen and say that this disability shall no longer exist; but, sir, I cannot think that it is our duty, in view of the embarrassed condition of the national Treasury, to take the step now proposed and pay them

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will permit me to say that in the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses this House passed such a bill as this; but the Senate did not concur in it.

Mr. HUNTON. The Senate did not act on it at all. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Caswell] will permit me to remind him that these pensioners whom we propose to restore to the rolls were all invalids, and being invalids they could have taken no part in the late war.

Mr. CASWELL. Let us contemplate this proposition for a few moments. We are about to restore to these parties a pension of fif-teen years' standing. It will take, I venture to say, a very large sum of money from the Treasury. The amount has been variously esti-mated from half a million to six million dollars. As has been exmated from half a million to six million dollars. As has been explained, we have no positive data by which we can be governed. I think we ought not to take such a step at this time. We cannot say here that the Congress which passed the law under which these pensioners were dropped had no right to pass that law; that it was an act of unkindness; that it ought never to have been passed. Yet that is what we say if we to-day provide for paying this money which has been thus withheld. In other words, it is simply saying that the Government of the United States has been merely a trustee for those parties who were engaged in the rebellion; that in this capacity it has preserved their funds for them until the present time and now will preserved their funds for them until the present time, and now will pay them over to them. I submit that if there was cause for passing this law in the beginning, such cause still exists, and that we ought not to pass to-day a measure which will be a virtual censure upon that legislation.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will allow me to say that the bills to which I referred as having been passed by this House in the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses did not contain any provision for the back pay, if I may use that term. They merely proposed to reinstate these persons upon the pension-rolls.

Mr. CASWELL. The provision for back pay is precisely what I chiest to object to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My only reason for offering my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin was that if his amendment should prevail I wanted it to be as good as I could get it. But I am opposed to the whole proposition, even if my amendment should be adopted by the committee.

I desire gentlemen to bear in mind that in 1861, at the commence-I desire gentlemen to bear in mind that in 1891, at the commencement of the late war, a man who had served in the war of 1812 must have been sixty-four years old, supposing him to have been eighteen when the war of 1812 closed. Besides, this bill only restores to the pension-rolls soldiers of the war of 1812 who were maimed or disabled—who were invalids. Now I appeal to this House and ask whether there is any man here or anywhere in the country whose heart is so callous that he would refuse this act of justice to a soldier of the war of 1812, who perchance was maimed and disabled in defending the very Capitol in which you sit, because in 1861 or 1862 or 1863 he sympathized with his children and with his section of the country?

I am sure that when the passions of the hour have passed away there is no broad-hearted American upon this continent who would sanction the idea that such a man ought to be punished by with-holding from him the pension which the law had given him on account of disability incurred in the service of his country.

Mr. CASWELL. I wish to raise the question whether the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is in order. I think it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that his amendment is the one now pending.

Mr. CASWELL. I have accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. HOUSE. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he would not be willing to further modify his amendment so as to let the arrearages reach back to the conclusion of the war?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that the last House of Representatives, on motion of the gentlemen from Massachuşetts, [Mr. Butler,] did incorporate in the bill the idea of paying these soldiers back to the point where they were dropped. There was no opposition to it in the House, and I do hope dropped. There was no opposition to it in the House, and 1 do hope that will be done in this case; I do hope these old soldiers will be taken up where they were dropped. This is the centennial year, and I hope in my heart of hearts that will be done. I believe it will be done. I believe there is a generous spirit abroad here that will take up these men and pay them from where they were dropped.

Let it be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the soldiers of the Mexican was were invalid registers many of them wounded upon

Mexican war were invalid pensioners, many of them wounded upon the battle-field, many pensioned on account of disease, and they could not, and doubtless did not, serve during the last war. Many were dropped from the rolls because they did not take the oath that they desired the success of the Federal arms. I hope a liberal spirit will prevail in this matter and that these men will be paid from the time they were dropped. I hope this Congress will be as liberal as the Forty-third Congress was in that respect.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a pretty liberal disposition on this side of the House on this question. In fact, it was evinced during the last Congress; but I want to remind gentlemen on the other side that they are in other matters manifesting, not a spirit always of liberality, but rather cutting and paring down what in some cases we believe to be necessary appropriations, because it is said the Treasury is empty and the revenues are low. They are cutting down appropriation bills, reducing the salaries of officials. They propose to turn out of office scores and hundreds of deserving men and women who have no place to turn to, because money is to be saved. In many cases these men who go have been soldiers in the war of the rebellion on the side of the Union. The reason given is that the needs of the Treasury are such that it must be done

I want to warn gentlemen when they put this measure through, upon which I know there is considerable liberality on this side of the House, that they are taking from the Treasury a sum of money which it will require a great deal of paring on appropriation bills to make up. Now, there has been a suspicion—

Mr. HUNTON. Let me ask the gentleman a question—

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to introduce any partisan element into this discussion, but there has been a suspicion and there has been a suggestion on this floor that every dollar that was to be saved in the direction of economy inaugurated on the other side would before the session was over be eaten up by claims of one sort and another coming from that part of the Union. I hope that will not be so, but I counsel gentlemen here to take notice if this passes, and it will re-ceive votes on this side, that it is a measure of liberality to a class of people who are in the South of course alone, and who to-day rest under the ban of disloyalty to the Government, which it is proposed to remove. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HUNTON. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine a question, whether he imputes any illiberality to this side of the House?

Mr. HALE. I did not mean to impute any illiberality to that side of the House, but merely to say there was on that side a lack of free appropriation.

Mr. HUNTON.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to remind the gentleman that when the invalid pension bill was before this House, reported from the Committee on Appropriations to pension the soldiers of the late war, not only no illiberality was manifested, but that every dollar asked for by the Pension Bureau to pay these soldiers of the late war was cheerfully granted by every member on this side of the House.

Mr. HALE. I never supposed that anybody would raise a question against the payment of those invalid pensioners.

Mr. HUNTON. I did not suppose any one would raise a question of liberality about these poor old cripples of the war of 1812.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has ex-

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman, there is certainly some reason in what the gentleman from Maine has said in regard to the subject of retrenchment. It is quite possible propositions for retrenchment may be carried to such an extent as to impair the operations of the Government or to defeat the proper action of some Department, but that retrenchment is necessary the situation of the country shows most clearly. It may be pressed further than is wise or it may fall short of that. We cannot always decide which it may be. But the necessity of retrenchment in the expenditures of this country is so obvious, that no member of the House can very safely refuse to vote for it because he may think it may be too strong or too severe.

Now, sir, so far as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] goes on that question, I would agree with him very well. But he can scarcely make that subject of retrenchment an offset for this one of pensions make that subject of retrenchment an offset for this one of pensions which is before the House. The question what we will pay to the servants of the Government for next year is one entirely within our control. We are underno obligation to those servants or officers whatever. We are the judges of what should be done, and we are responsible for the results. And though many may suffer there is no injustice and no wrong. But, sir, in the matter of pensions we meet another and entirely different question. There is here a debt, an obligation which we have taken upon ourselves to liquidate. These soldiers have a perfectly legal claim upon the Government for past services, and though in the case of a portion of those who have a claim for this debt their claim may have been suspended on account of supposed misconduct or actual misconduct, nevertheless, if this suspension should be removed, the claim is still a debt and not a matter of gratistic of the control of the claim is still a debt and not a matter of gratistic of the control of the contro should be removed, the claim is still a debt and not a matter of gratuity, nor of gratitude, nor of gift, nor of compensation. We recognize the obligation of the Government to pay that sum of money to those persons which the Government agreed many years ago to pay. Now, sir, I think that the exception which is proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin ought not to be made. I do not doubt that the Congress did wisely to suspend the payment of these pensions at the time they were suspended. But the difficulties in which the country was placed at that time have passed away. New lights have come upon us and new opportunities for the future, and we can therefore very well overlook any indiscretion or any actual misconduct which those people may have been guilty of at that time.

And more than that, I have this to say upon this question. I have been here off and on for ten years to get pensions for the soldiers of 1812. The old men I represent one by one have died. They have fallen away. They ask for this as an honor, not as a compensation; as a recognition by the United States Government on behalf of those fallen away. They ask for this as an honor, not as a compensation; as a recognition by the United States Government on behalf of those who served it in time of peril. They ask it as an honor alone. They have sought it and never got it. If these gentlemen on the other side of the House were not here, I do not believe they would get it now; and if the entrance of those gentlemen to the House gives the soldiers of 1812 a pension, to which they are so richly entitled, I shall be very glad if that portion of the citizens of the South whose pensions were suspended for the reasons referred to have them restored when they are given to those constituents whom I represent, who are so richly entitled to them.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to say a word on this question of retrenchment. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] to another fact. When the pension appropriation bill was before the House this side of the House knew that there was in that pension bill a large amount of frauds, and yet they did not interfere with the passage of the bill on that account.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I desire to say that I had the honor to report that bill from the Committee on Appropriations, and I must disclaim any such knowledge as he on Appropriations, and I must disclaim any such knowledge as he speaks of.

Mr. HARRISON. What I refer to is this: There was a gentleman on this floor who spoke of pension agencies in which there was a large amount of fraud—I do not mean fraud on the part of the soldiers, but fraud in the agencies. Yet this House, feeling that the soldier and the widow of the soldier should not be deprived of their pittances, would not take up that question of frauds, but passed the bill. They were liberal. They were willing that even some large frauds should pass unpunished, rather than that his pittance should be taken from the soldier.

I have this further to say. There are men now in the North who I have this further to say. There are men now in the North who are asking for their pay who cannot get it, simply because when in the South, to save their lives probably, they were forced to take the oath to the southern confederacy. May there not have been old men, men of the war of 1812, who were on the side of the southern confederacy, and who yet may have been as loyal as any man in the North, but who could not in the presence of the overpowering opinion of the country in which they were living go against their people? Yet when those men and their widows, who have been for years probably with scarcely anything to live on, come here and ask us to-day for assistance it is said we cannot give it to them. I for one Mr. for assistance, it is said we cannot give it to them. I for one, Mr. Chairman, feel that if a soldier of the United States of the war of 1812 may have committed a wrong and fought against the Union or even have been a silent spectator, we ought to say we will forgive him the wrong on account of the good he did when our Government was in its peril so many years ago. And as a northern man, as a man elected here not only by democratic votes but by a very large number of republican votes, I believe that my constituency will approve of my voting to give to these soldiers the full benefit of this bill, forgetting the recent past in the far distant past when they gave such important aid to the Government.

mportant aid to the Government.

Mr. HOGE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of giving these men who have fought for their country in the war of 1812 the pensions they ask. Sir, when these men were called upon to perform their duty to their country as citizens and when they risked their lives in the cause of the country, at that time they were loyal, patriotic, and true. They have now become old and infirm, many of them cripples, and this is one of these measures that appeals to me as an old soldier. and this is one of those measures that appeals to me as an old soldier of the Union Army. While I am a member of the republican party, while I am opposed to every act of the rebellion, yet this is one of the occasions that appeals to my charity as a soldier. I am here in behalf of the people I represent in South Carolina to ask the Congress of the United States to give to these old veterans the small pittance of a pension to enable them to live their last days, and live without becoming beggars on the community.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I want the Congress of the United States to show to these men and to the people of the country that when we come here to legislate upon these great questions we can for a time forget party, that we can forget all the past, and only remember the good acts that these people have done in behalf of their country when the country was in peril. Let us give them this pittance. Talk about retrenchment and reform! The country will never feel this. I advocate this measure in the same spirit in which I would have advocated the appropriation for the Centennial, to bring the people together and to renew their love and allegiance to their country. So now though these men may be few in number they have their children scattered throughout the land, and if per-chance they were forced by circumstances over which they had no control to take part in the rebellion or to acquiesce in it, or it may be to openly engage in the cause of the confederacy, let us forgive and forget, let us restore their names to the pension-roll and give them this small pittance, that they may not be lingering on the charity of their friends or on their country.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, as one of the committee who reported this bill I made this matter a subject of serious reflection. I had some doubt as to what I ought to do, but reflection taught me that I ought to restore, as far as my vote would go, these old men to the positions that they occupied before the war. They are every one of them invalids, every one of them old men. There is not a man of them who has not seen more years than myself. They could not have rendered from their age and condition any considerable service to the cause of the rebellion. They have simply been guilty of participating in the feelings of the neighborhoods in which they were born. I am a man of pretty strong prejudices, and I feel the wrong of the rebellion about as strongly as any man can feel it, and yet I know that a man who does not feel to some degree as his neighbors feel in times of excitement is either less or more than a man, and I do not appreciate very highly the crime which these old men have committed in sympathizing—my friends on the other side must reflection. I had some doubt as to what I ought to do, but reflection and I do not appreciate very nighty the crime which these old men have committed in sympathizing—my friends on the other side must not find fault with it—in the craze of 1861. I feel now, sir, that I am doing not what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] says, paying a debt—no, not a debt, for the acts of these men forfeited all their claims as such upon the Government—but I feel that feited all their claims as such upon the Government—but I feel that in going for this measure I am doing an act of kindness that I owe to myself, that I owe to the good men of the neighborhood that I represent, that I owe to the feelings of the North, a Representative here representing northern men, and I wish it may be so that those sympathizing with me in my politics might vote as our friends voted in the last Congress, that we shall come forward and do an act of magnanimity to these men who in the dark days of our Government came forward and struggled manfully for the right, then, as our boys who wore the blue stood up manfully in the cause of the Government yesterday. I want to do this act as an act of right, and, having done it as an act of right, I want to ask my friends on the other side of the House coming from the southern side of the Potomac, when you come to get on the hustings once more, do remember among the hard things you charge upon us—you do not charge us often with hard things to get on the hustings once more, do remember among the hard things you charge upon us—you do not charge us often with hard things here, but to your own people—do tell them that sometimes the northern heart is not quite as hard as it is often represented to be.

Now, sir, I believe this act due on the part of the minority, due to ourselves. It is a duty to ourselves and a duty to our constituents to vote for this bill. What is it? It is a great sum; it is $500,000; that is about the amount of the money we give to these men, the money which had been suspended; but if it amounted to $5,000,000 I would pay it. I am not one of those who believe that the country is so much distressed as everybody is representing it to be. It is more diswould pay it. I am not one of those who believe that the country is so much distressed as everybody is representing it to be. It is more distressed by the howling of men here on the one side and on the other than from any other cause. I felt so the other day when the salaries of our foreign ministers were cut down below the position they ought of our foreign ministers were cut down below the position they ought to occupy in the courts to which we send them to represent the country. I felt that the country was not so much distressed as that it could do wrong. We are too poor to afford that, and as to this sum of money proposed to be paid to these old men we cannot afford to go on without paying it. And I should wish, in honor of the country, in honor of the party to which I belong, in honor of the section of the country from which I come, that we should vote now, as our representatives did in the last Congress and the Congress before, to pay to these men the money they would have had but for the excited condition of affairs in which they lived and participated; but in the wrong-doing that occurred they could take no active part.

Mr. COX. I do not propose at this late hour to discuss the merits

Mr. COX. I do not propose at this late hour to discuss the merits or the economy of this bill. I think it would be wise for this House to adjourn, so that we may be able to-morrow to take up this bill with a more intelligent understanding of the effect of the amendment proposed to it. I know that in former Congresses there was liberality on both sides of the House toward the old soldier. This House passed a bill giving this back pay to these old soldiers and the Senate defeated it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Do not call it "back pay."
Mr. COX. I do not care what you call it, whether "back pay" or Mr. COX. I do not care what you call it, whether "back pay" or arrears of pensions. While we may economize on this pension business in other directions, according to the investigations made by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jenks] and by his committee, and thereby save a half or three-quarters of a million of dollars in the collection and settlement of these pensions; and while there may be much room for economy in the adjudication of pension claims, I think it would be well for the House, before we enter upon any loose legislation by way of amendment to this bill, to adjourn until to-morrow, in order that we may become better informed in regard to it. I therefore move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. Clymer having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Blackburn reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1605) amending the laws granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows, and had come to no resolution thereon. thereon.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent of the House that Senate bill No. 472, changing the times of holding terms of the district courts of the United States in the State of West Virginia. ginia, reported from the Senate to-day, be now taken from the Speakginia, reported from the Senate to-day, be now taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time. The time now fixed by law for holding these courts is very near at hand, and it is very important to suitors and members of the bar in that State to know whether this bill shall or shall not pass. Hon. John J. Jackson, judge of that court, is now in this city, and very desirous of knowing the fate of this bill. I ask unanimous consent that it be now taken up and acted many.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It is very important that this bill should be acted upon now. The time now fixed by law for holding the district courts of West Virginia is nearly upon us. I know that my colleague [Mr. FAULKNER] has a proposition pending before the House to provide for holding a term of the court in his own town of Martinsburgh. But, if this bill shall pass, it cannot prejudice his bill at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. It may not prejudice it, but I think it will fa-cilitate the whole matter to have this bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. They can act upon it at their next meeting, and recommend such a disposition of it as they may deem proper.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I suggest that the committee have leave to report the bill at any time.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report it any time.

RE-ISSUE OF PATENTS.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Patents, as a substitute for House bills Nos. 1242 and 1634, a bill (H. R. No. 2273) to amend section 4916 of the Revised Statutes in relation to re-issue of patents: which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER was granted leave of absence for one week from Friday next, on account of important business.

Mr. Whiting was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. Douglas was granted leave of absence for one week from Saturday next.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the memorial of John T. Henry, George A. Merwin, H. K. Miller, F. B. Thurber, E. R. Durkee, T. F. Lees, Charles Watrous, A. B. Miller, and B. P. Baker, a committee appointed by the New York Cheap Transportation Association to bring to the notice of Congress certain facts pertaining to the question of transportation; and as the memorial is somewhat lengthy I beg, under the rule, to make a brief statement of its contents. The application of rate, to make a orier statement of its contents. The application of steam and electricity to the purposes of commerce has resulted in a complete and sudden revolution in the commercial and economical conditions and customs of the world, and differences in the cost of transportation which a few years since were deemed trivial and insignificant now decide the welfare of great communities. The old common law of highways was based upon the principle of public common law of highways was based upon the principle of public ownership and private use, but when steam rendered the construc-tion of a new and improved system of highways possible this func-tion of government was delegated to associations of individuals and without sufficient restrictions or safeguards. The result is our present inadequate, incongruous, and chaotic system of transportation, in which mismanagement and irregularities have been so frequent that discredit has been thrown upon American enterprises in all the finan-cial centers of the world. The interests of both stockholders and the general public have in many cases been willfully disregarded by unprincipled managers who do not exercise even the selfish interest unprincipled managers who do not exercise even the selfish interest of fostering commerce in order that it may yield the transporter a legitimate revenue. The Government regulates our banking and other interests, yet here is an interest which in importance overshadows them all—an interest which shares with the Government the power to levy and collect taxes upon the production and commerce of all the States, entirely independent of national control.

In this memorial flagrant cases of discrimination are mentioned aboving that freight is exercised for favored shipmers at rates that are showing that freight is carried for favored shippers at rates that are not given to the general public.

Bridge companies and other inside organizations are instanced which enrich their managers at the expense of stockholders and the general public.

Flagrant instances of stock-watering and kindred abuses are given, and in conclusion the memorial states that these abuses have become so incorporated in the present system that they cannot be reached by ordinary methods of legislation, and that a trunk line of railroad should be constructed between the grain-growing sections of the West and the Atlantic seaboard, as a regulator to the present system; that this may be built and owned by Government and leased for purposes of operation, or that Government may aid a private company to construct such a road, provided that in consideration of such aid a supervision and control is assumed that will properly protect the public interest.

I beg to say that this committee represents some fifteen hundred of the leading business men of the city of New York. I move that the memorial be referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Isabella H. Silvey, widow of William Silvey, deceased, late major Fifth United States Artillery, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present also the petition of Amasa Sprague, Governor Lippitt, Ex-Governor Smith, and many other leading merchants and navigators of Providence, Rhode Island, asking that a light-house or monument and spindle may be erected on Whale Rock, at the mouth of Narraganset Bay. Accompanying this petition is a list of more than twenty steamers which ply constantly to Providence, passing that dangerous place. There is also a list of losses, amounting to nearly $50,000 within a few years. I ask the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce, and home that it will receive petition to the Committee on Commerce, and hope that it will receive their especial attention. It is a dangerous rock at the very mouth of Narraganset Bay. Navigation should be protected there by a lighthouse; but as that would be an expensive work requiring submarine construction, I will in the actual condition of the Treasury limit myself at present to asking for a monument and spindle, and have prepared a bill for that purpose.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Mrs. Eliza Sayles Manchester, widow of the late Joseph S. Manchester, captain and commissary United States Army, praying that Congress consider favorably her previous petition to be placed on the pension list; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a petition very numerously signed by citizens of Portland, Oregon, in which they represent that many mines of silver and gold are being constantly discovered and developed in the Pacific northwest, embracing Oregon, Idaho, Washington Territory, Alaska, and the British Columbia, which, together with the many mines already developed afford an annual yield of about $3,000,000. The Columbia River bars are rich in gold for hundreds of miles. They receive deposits of float-gold every annual freshet. This large river and its tributaries drain a vast area of auriferous territory. The city of Portland is the great commercial center of this extensive region. It is of great importance to commerce that a United States assay office should be established at that place. They respectfully pray that such action may be taken by Congress as will establish such an office at the city of Portland. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY presented additional papers in relation to the petition of Captain George D. Hill; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Martha Edwards, of Portland, Maine, widow of the late Daniel Brown, United States Artillery, praying to be granted a pension for services rendered by her late husband in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pen-

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard, of Saint Clair County, Michigan, to report it back adversely and move its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I ask the Senator to allow the bill to go on the Calendar. Mr. HAMILTON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of soldiers and sailors of the late war, praying the passage of an act granting them a bounty of $8.33 per month for the time served by them, deducting all bounty heretofore granted by the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S.No.61) for the relief of John R. Harrington, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I consider myself instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a paper purporting by the indorsement to be the petition of Stephen D. Lee, praying for the removal of his disabilities, to return the same to the Senate and ask to be discharged from its consideration, because on inspection it is found to be a copy of a letter addressed to the President of the United States on the 9th of July, 1865. I presume the Senator who presented it, the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Gordon,] whom I do not now see in his seat, mistook it for some papers that were before the committee at the last session; but as the matter now stands we have nothing to act upon. Therefore I ask that the committee be discharged. I think there will be found in the files of the Senate, however, if the Senator chooses to have it taken from the files and referred to us, a regular petition of this gentleman, for I see by the calendar of the Committee on the Judiciary that we reported a bill for his relief at the last session, which, through the lateness of the time, did not pass.

government, and for the admission of said State into the Unino on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, have directed me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. There are reasons why this bill should be promptly passed. I presume it will not elicit any discussion, and I ask its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should not like to have it passed without some information on the subject. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state the object of this bill. By the terms of the original enabling act, all those were made voters and allowed to vote upon the constitution to be submitted for adoption or rejection to the people of that Territory who were then, at the time of the passage of the enabling act, entitled to vote. By the terms of the bill as drafted, a constitutional convention was provided for, to meet at an early day; and had the bill passed in that form, that provision would have been proper; but by an amendment placed upon the bill in the Senate prior to its passage, the time for the meeting of the constitutional convention, and consequently for the action of the people of Colorado on the constitution which was to be offered by that convention to the people, was deferred for more than a year; so that the people of Colorado are to vote upon this constitution on the 4th of July next. There are a large number of voters, made up by emigration which has gone into that Territory since that time, who will then be voters under the laws of the Territory, and who properly and rightfully ought to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska what length of time the laws of the Territory require in respect of residence before the right to vote accrues?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Six months. That is one section of this bill.

The other is required for the same reason, namely, the deferring of the admission of the State by the amendments which were put upon the enabling act in the Senate, as the Senator from Vermont will remember.

The provision which has recently been made in other new States allowing the balance of the legislative appropriations, whatever that might be, to be diverted and used for the payment of the expenses of the constitutional convention, was in the original bill; but in consequence of the amendments of the Senate as to the time of the meeting of the constitutional convention, the action of the people of Colorado has made necessary the using up of that appropriation, which was then ample and would then have been sufficient to pay the members of the convention. That appropriation is now used up. The convention is now in session. It has been in session since December last. It is now in session. It has been in session since December last. It is now about ready to adjourn, and unless this bill is passed and this appropriation made, there will be no money to pay the members. I believe there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know that I have any objection to the first feature of the bill. Indeed, I do not know that I shall have any objection to it at all; but I notice that it provides for an appropriation. I am not certain in regard to that and so I salt that appropriation. I am not certain in regard to that, and so I ask that the bill lie over until to-morrow, that I may examine that feature of the bill. I dare say I shall have no objection to the general proposition of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I think this bill is right in itself. I have looked over it; and I hope he will withdraw his objection. It passed after a full discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over that discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the looked over the discussion in the other House and I looked over the looked after a full discussion in the other House, and I looked over that discussion, and I believe that the appropriation as asked for here is correct. Unless my friend from Maine has special objection, I hope he will not insist on the bill being delayed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no special objection; but the general objection I think I have. It makes an appropriation for what I do not understand that there is any precedent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state to the honorable Senator that there is a precedent for it in the admission of my own State.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine That is what I want to ascertain. I must insist on the bill going over.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Chair if the bill goes over

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not, it will not take it up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will have no difficulty in getting it up; I will make the motion myself if I think it allowable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 386) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greelaud, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petirie also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the pettion of Anton Tschudi, late a musician in Company A, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a peusion on account of an accident occurring to him at Atlanta, Georgia, by which his leg was broken, necessitating amputation, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Maria Ann Knauber, widow of Adam Knauber, deceased, praying that she may be allowed a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of George Hibban, for Hibban & Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of George Hibben, for Hibben & Co., praying to have refunded certain taxes assessed and collected on tobacco wrongfully, as alleged, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 490) for the relief of Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to report a bill and recommend its passage.

The bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that this case received the favorable action of the committee at the last session, and also of the Senate. I ask the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, $134 in full for moneys wrongfully collected from Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1863, and January, 1870.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1384) to change the name of the schooner Turner and Keller, of Oswego, to that of Falmouth, direct me to report back the same favorably, without amendment, and I ask the present consideration of the bill, as there can be no objection to it. I can explain it in a moment if any Senator wishes an explanation.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

PENSIONERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WITHERS. I move for the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 89) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

Mr. SHERMAN. A bill of a similar character is now pending in the House of Representatives and under consideration there.

Mr. WITHERS. That is a bill much more extensive in its scope than the present bill. This is not liable to the objections that I presume will be made to the bill pending in the House of Representatives. This is a bill very limited in its scope, the object of which is very apparent. I suppose it will not lead to discussion. It was unany invarishy reported by the Pension Committee of the Senate.

wery apparent. I suppose it will not lead to discussion. It was unals imously reported by the Pension Committee of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator really thinks it is worth while to have the two Houses engaged in the discussion of the same subjectmatter at the same time, very well.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state frankly that there will be probably very little difficulty in securing the passage of this bill; but I apprehend there may be great difficulty in securing the passage of the bill reading in the other House in the state. pending in the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall make no objection to the bill being taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the bill be read for information before

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the Committee on Peusions with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the substitute which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the reported substitute, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving, heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain, or for service in any of the Indian wars, or for service in the Mexican war, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An actauthorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862; and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so modified as to authorize the payment of claims under this act: Provided, That no pensions shall be paid to any one whose name shall be so restored for the time during which his name was stricken from the pension-rolls.

SEC. 2. That all joint resolutions, acts, or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed so far as such conflict may exist.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be in force from and after its approval.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a written report with that bill? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.
Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear that read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WITH-ERS from the Committee on Pensions on the 3d instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom Senate bill No. 89 was referred, submit the

The Committee on Pensions, to whom Senate bill No. 89 was referred, submit the following report:

The bill provides for placing on the pension-rolls the names of all soldiers of the war of 1812 and the widows of such soldiers who married prior to 1850. It also proposes to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all stricken therefrom in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels." It also proposes to modify the "joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," so as to permit payments under this act.

The committee propose to amend the bill by striking ont all that portion which provides for placing on the pension-rolls the names of all surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 and the widows of such as married prior to 1850, because there was a division of sentiment as to the propriety of such action and because the passage of such a bill would involve a heavy charge upon the Treasury. They therefore recommend simply the restoration to the pension-rolls of the names of such persons as were stricken therefrom under the provisions of the act of February 4, 1882, with a provisio which forbids the payment of any pension for the time during which these pensioners were dropped.

The passage of this bill is demanded by considerations of humanity and justice, as its beneficiaries would be those only who had suffered from wounds or other disability received in the service of the Government, and the number of these is so small that the Treasury will be taxed to a very trivial amount by the passage of the bill. The Commissioner of Pensions informs the committee that the whole number of persons stricken from the rolls under the provisions of the act of 1862 was four hundred and sixty-four. This number at $96 per year is $4

Mr. WRIGHT. Without committing myself at all for or against this bill, I suggest to my friend from Virginia that it is not at all probable he can dispose of it this morning. As has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, (if we may refer to that,) this question at least in some form is before the House of Representatives in a bill they are now considering. It seems to me that the whole subject of it is covered by the bill they are at present considering. I suggest to him, therefore, that it can hardly be disposed of this morning, and that he had better allow it to pass over. I think it is a matter of such importance that we at all events ought to have an opportunity of examining it more fully than we can possibly do in the ten minutes left of the morning hour.

Mr. WITHERS. I gave notice on two or three previous occasions of my purpose to call up the bill and indicated its character in order that Senators might have an ample opportunity to look into the matter and investigate it and decide for themselves what course to take.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I remember correctly, the Senator from Virginia gave notice that he would call up the bill so soon as the then pending order was disposed of, but that pending order is not yet disposed of.

When it shall be disposed of, then of course he will be entitled to his

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that a previous notice, however, had been given while a previous bill was pending; but I was unable to secure the attention of the Chair in order to get up the bill when that measure was disposed of, and other business took its place.

With regard to the objection urged by the Senator from Iowa that this may possibly be troubling us with double legislation on the same subject, I will only repeat what I said to the Senator from Ohio, that the scope of this bill is so much less than that of the bill now pending in the House of Representatives that I hope this bill can be passed without opposition inasmuch as it received the unanimous assent of the Committee on Pensions, but I am very doubtful as to the fate of the other bill, and consequently I prefer securing favorable legislation on this bill if it can be had. That is my reason for bringing it up now

As is stated in the report connected with the bill, it involves a very as is stated in the report connected with the bill, it involves a very small charge on the Treasury. Three years ago the number of persons who had been dropped from the rolls was reported as being four hundred and sixty-four. That dropping, you must remember, was about fourteen years ago. The mortality in that class of pensioners exceeds 10 per cent. per annum; so that the Senate will see at once that the number of pensioners put upon the roll under this bill, if it shall pass, will be very small. They are all persons aged, and infirm by reason of disabilities incurred if not by age; and I had supposed that these circumstances would probably secure the favorable consideration of the Senate for the bill which I have reported; and probably it will not occupy much time in its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. If this bill is confined simply to restoring to the rolls the names that were once there, it would not be a very important matter, and I certainly should not stand in the way of that being done.

Mr. WITHERS. That is all it does.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were stricken from the rolls during the war, living in States which were in rebellion and armed opposition against the Government of the United States. That was proper enough, and as a matter of course we could not pay them during the war. Not only those who participated in or sympathized with the rebellion, but all who lived in the rebellious districts, might very properly, from motives of public policy, have been stricken from the roll. Money ought not to have been sent to anybody, even to a loyal man, in the Southern States at a time when the States themselves were in armed hostility to the Government of the United States.

But I rose to ask the Senator from Virginia whether this bill does not go further, whether it does not also open the benefits of the law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 to all those who may have lived in the Southern States, without regard to their participation in the rebellion. The general pension act for the soldiers of the war of 1812 was passed since the war of the rebellion was over, and we are now paying in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 a year as pensions to soldiers who served for sixty days in the war of 1812, or their widows. It seems to me that the last clause of this bill from line 14 on, which repeals the joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression, will open the door to applications by all classes of persons who served in the war of 1812 for pensions under the act of 1871. Am I correct in that? But I rose to ask the Senator from Virginia whether this bill does

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will examine the bill, I think he will find that his impressions are not correct. The bill simply provides for the restoration to the pension-roll of those persons whose names were stricken from it under the act of 1862; and the proviso which he last referred to, repealing the joint resolution prohibiting the payment of any money by an officer of the Government to persons who were concerned in the rebellion, only proposes to repeal so much of it as would prevent officers making payments under the provisions of this act. It does not repeal the joint resolution in toto. It still remains in force with regard to all other claimants under any law, and only authorizes the payment of this particular class of pensioners. The repeal is confined to what may affect this particular class. It is

Mr. SHERMAN. And this bill does not extend further?
Mr. SHERMAN. To no other pensions?

Mr. SHERMAN. 10 no other pensions?

Mr. WITHERS. Not to pensions originating or authorized under any subsequent legislation of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nor to back pensions accrued?

Mr. WITHERS. No; it specifically excludes the payment of arrearages. I will state that every effort possible has been made to secure such a bill as would command the assent of the Senate without much dissension and bases it has been living to the secure such as the se out much dissension, and hence it has been limited in its operations.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me that it occurred very naturally to the Senator from Ohio, especially if he listened to the reading of the report, that the bill might not be well suited to the apparent pur-pose of the report. I observed from the reading of the Secretary a statement that the design was to pay no one except those who had been wounded in the service. That is another mode of stating that the only purpose is to restore those to the pension-rolls whose names were actually borne on those rolls prior to that legislation which gave pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, who never suffered wounds pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, who never suffered wounds or disability, upon condition only that they had served for sixty days. Restoring to the rolls those whose names were upon the rolls anterior to that legislation, and doing nothing more, would very likely, independent of the question which arises in another part of the bill, have no effect except that which the Senator from Virginia now ascribes to this bill. I agree, however, with the Senator from Ohio, that by reason of the words to which he has called attention and also of other words preceding those, if this language were to be enacted into law as it stands, more than a question would be left whether every man in the South is not not upon a footing with every man everywhere. in the South is not put upon a footing with every man everywhere else, and so vice versa, irrespective of his position in the late civil

What does that mean-"heretofore pensioned?" I stop there. I stop there. What does that mean—neretorore pensioned in Surely the meaning is not confined to those whose names were found upon the pension-rolls, who were the actual recipients of pensions. Obviously, I think, stopping there, the words would embrace all those who by law, by legislative action, by the grant of the Government, had been embraced as pensioners, whether their applications had been made or whether their pensions had been received or not.

Or for service in any of the Indian wars, or for service in the Mexican war.

Now come the words which the Senator from Virginia no doubt supposed qualified this:

And whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862.

If those words have the effect which I am bound to suppose the committee intended they should have, and that meaning is clear, no doubt their effect would be to restrict and confine the operation of this act; but it seems to me that apter words than those and more unmistakable can be used if that be the purpose of their use. But now look a little further:

And that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so modified as to authorize the payment of claims under this act.

"Of claims under this act." It struck me when I first read those words that they could hardly be accidentally ambiguous and vague. If the purpose is to permit him to pay the pensions heretofore stated, that is one thing, but the purpose seems to be to permit him to pay "claims under this act."

Mr. WITHERS. I will ask the Senator, with his permission, what claims can arise under the act other than pension claims

Mr. CONKLING. I will answer the honorable Senator in the way in which I intended to anticipate his question. As a rule of legislation, as a rule of drawing legal papers, it is always safe to say what you mean, in place of saying something else and trusting to Providence that it may not be held to mean anything except the particular thing in view. Now, a pension allowed, adjudicated, paid, the name of the pensioner upon the pension-roll, the whole thing consummated and completed, ceases to be a claim at large; it is a liquidated, ascertained, and I may say, adjudicated and settled matter. A claim is a vaguer, a more roying, a more general phrase. Therefore I would tained, and I may say, adjudicated and settled matter. A claim is a vaguer, a more roving, a more general phrase. Therefore I would criticise this language if the statement were "the claims specified in this act;" but it is not even that; the article is not there; the words are "claims under this act." "Claim," I believe, is the broadest single word known to the law. It embraces every requisition or demand, especially if it concerns money, which one person may have upon another. Now this bill assembling together in a group those who were entitled to pensions for service or wounds in three wars, if nothing more, prosess to repeal an act which in general terms prohibits payment to poses to repeal an act which in general terms prohibits payment to certain classes of persons, or rather modifies it so far as to enable pay-ments to be made for claims under this act.

I submit to the honorable Senator that it is not worth while to be so economical in the employment of terms as not to make this bill declare, if that be all it means, that notwithstanding that joint resolution these pensions shall be paid. Certainly there can be no mistake about that; and I do not mean of course to ascribe to anybody an intention to do anything more. I criticise the bill as I find it, and I forbear to say anything of what my impression would be touching the general matter; but before we come to that, it seems to me well that the bill should be made to express truly and unmistakably, if it does not, the intention of the committee as disclosed in the report. I think as it stands it is open to an endeavor on the part of many persons whom the intention is not to embrace, to make their claims among those which are covered by the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state with the utmost frankness that the terms were not used designedly to make them ambiguous, or to open the way for any character of claims to be collected under it, other than those that are enumerated and specified in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator of course does not understand me to intimate that I supposed they were. I did not intend to impute any such thing.

Mr. WITHERS. I very willingly accept the statement just made by the Senator; while it is true that a previous remark of his in my opinion left it open to that imputation. I accept his statement with great pleasure.

I will state further that I am not learned in legal lore; but there are several gentlemen on the committee who are lawyers of high repute. This bill has received their careful scrutiny and consideration, and is the product of their united judgment; and, so far as I am concerned, I will very cheerfully state that any suggestion that will meet the views of the distinguished Senator from New York, restricting the views of the distinguished Senator from New York, restricting the operation of this bill specifically to pensioners, would be perfectly agreeable to me. I have not the slightest objection to the bill being amended to that extent. It is designed simply to apply to the class of pensioners who are enumerated in it, and I will state that according to my construction of language it seems to me impossible that it could apply to any other class than those enumerated, namely, those where the restriction from the relief the country of the country of the second of t whose names were stricken from the rolls under the operation of the law of 1862, and it cannot by possibility open the question of claims under the law of 1871 granting pensions to the survivors of the war of 1812

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This question will evidently cause more debate, and I feel myself authorized to say that the Senate ought to vote on the regular order of yesterday, which is the question of laying on the table a subject-matter which has been sufficiently long before on the table a subject-matter which has been sufficiently long before us to enable us to dispose of it in no longer time than is necessary to call the roll. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine calls for the regular order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I only desire to make a suggestion to amend the pension bill to meet the views of the Senator from New York,

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will have an opportunity when the other matter is disposed of.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine insists on the regular order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday. The committee of conference having made a report on the joint resolution

(H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Wadleigh] moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was concurred in. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] moved to lay that motion on the table; and the question is upon laying on the table the motion

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to inquire whether or not a motion to indefinitely postpone the motion to lay on the table is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. The motion to lay on the table takes precedence. The question is on laying on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 34, nays 28; as follows:

34, hays 20; as 10110WS:

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Eaton, Fnglish, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kell<sup>1</sup>, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Patterson, Kansom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, and Whyte—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bogy, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Dennis, Hamilton, Norwood, Randolph, and Thurman—10.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WITHERS. If that matter has been disposed of, I call up

Mr. Withers. I that matter has been disposed of, I can up Senate bill No. 89.
Mr. HOWE. I call for the regular order.
Mr. WITHERS. Senate bill No. 89 was informally laid aside in order that the conference report, which was the regular order pending at the adjournment last night, might be disposed of. That has been

Mr. HOWE. I should be very glad to get the action of the Senate upon the bill that was under consideration yesterday, and which was laid aside informally to consider the conference report touching the Mr. HOWE. District of Columbia.

Mr. WITHERS. My understanding was that the bill in my charge was laid aside at the close of the morning hour to take up the unfinished business of yesterday. That having been disposed of, I expected that the bill under consideration this morning would come up again. I simply desire, if that is the case, to move an amendment to cover the objection of the Senator from New York, and proceed with

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill (S. No. 32) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts and for the punishment of crimes committed by and against Indians was laid aside yesterday for the purpose of considering another measure. It was not called up before the day expired, leaving the unfinished business the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, and therefore it was shut out. The Senator from Virginia has obtained the floor and can get the sense of the Senate on his motion, and if he fails in that the Senator from Wisconsin will be recognized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Virginia is to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 89.

Mr. KEY. I rise to suggest to my friend from Virginia that I think it will be better to let his bill lie over. The House of Representatives is now acting upon a question of a similar character, and if the House bill is sent here, and a bill from the Senate is sent to the House, the result will be to embarrass and confuse the whole matter. It seems to me it would be better for the Senate to wait until the House bill arrives here, so that we can have both bills before us and agree upon one bill. Otherwise our bill may be lost in the House and the House bill lost here, and leave us at a great disadvantage as I

Mr. WITHERS. I am perfectly willing to take any action in the matter that may be deemed most desirable; and, as I understand the friends of the measure informally laid aside yesterday are exceedingly anxious to get a vote on it, I will allow this bill to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia withdraws his motion.

Mr INGALLS. With the understanding that after the conclusion of the pending bill it may be resumed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the pension bill will not be taken up to day. It is a matter which ought to undergo considerable consideration, so that we may know exactly what principle it is we are adopting in connection with it, and therefore I hope it may not be taken up until to-morrow. I want to look at the law.

Mr. SARGENT. I submit to be printed an amendment to the pension bill.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to add at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided further, That no persons shall be restored to the pension-rolls under this act unless the Commissioner of Pensions shall be satisfied by evidence of the identity of such person, and that such person is now surviving.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before this matter passes from the attention of the Senate, I wish to call attention to the fact that this bill has not been yet before the Senate; it has not been taken up. It has been spoken of as if we were to resume its consideration as soon as we dispose of the pending measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for consideration has not been put.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice, as I did yesterday, that immediately on the conclusion of Senate bill No. 32 I shall move to take up House bill No. 810, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, on coming into the Chamber this morning, my attention was called by a brother-Senator to a calumnious notice in a newspaper, the Baltimore American and Commercial Advertiser, referring to myself. I send it to the desk and ask the Clerk to read the marked paragraph.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE WHISKY-RING LIGHTNING.

The statement is telegraphed West and South from here to-night that the Attorney-General is in possession of sufficient evidence to ask for the indictment of Collector Casey, of New Orleans, and Senator West, of Louisiana, for complicity in the New Orleans whisky frauds. Also, that, if indictments are found, the Treasury Department will ask that the cases be removed from Judge Billings's court, in Louisiana, before Judge Emmons, in Tennessee.

Mr. WEST. As soon as my attention was called to that I addressed a communication to the Attorney-General, which I ask the Clerk to read, and he will see the reply on the reverse of the paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 24, 1876.

Dear Sir: I beg to call your attention to the accompanying newspaper with a marked paragraph, stating that you have in your possession information warranting an indictment being found against me.

Permit me to inquire whether any such statement is authorized by you and whether you have such information?

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. R. WEST.

Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, Attorney-General United States.

Senator West:
Not one word of truth in it. I never heard a word about it until your note.
Yours truly,
EDWARDS PIERREPONT,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT, Attorney-General.

Mr. WEST. I will not detain the Senate longer with this subject further than to say that the malice that dictates all these current attacks upon myself is beneath my contempt.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 32.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 32) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts, and for the punishment of crimes committed by and against Indians, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. WINDOM, to insert at the end of the second section:

And provided further. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to that part of the Sioux reservation lying between the north and south forks of the Cheyenne River and east of the east line of Wyoming Territory.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Minnesota would not press that amendment. If he will press the amendment, I wish he would amend it, and I think he will amend it. He does certainly want the first section of this act to apply to that reserva-tion. There is not a reservation in the world to which the first sec-tion is as important as it is to that. That is the only law which will secure life or property or tend to secure life or property among the white squatters. I wish the Senator would not press the amendment secure life or property or tend to secure life or property among the white squatters. I wish the Senator would not press the amendment at all, because I think we ought to take up the subject of that reservation, seriously consider it, and legislate with direct reference to that; but if you will not except it from the operations of any part of this bill we shall be driven to that legislation before we are ninety days older, I think. If you except it from the operations of this bill, then we shall not be driven to consider the subject until we are driven by the exigencies of war, which will be very soon, I fear. But if Senators think it best to press that amendment upon this bill, I should be glad to have the vote of the Senate upon it. If we adont the amendglad to have the vote of the Scnate upon it. If we adopt the amendment, the Sioux reservation will not be any worse off than it is now; and then we shall have the first section and the last section, and that will be legislation, and legislation in the right direction; and I would rather have that than nothing. But I did want to escape the discussion of the whole Indian question, and I thought we might escape it while this bill was pending.

Mr. WINDOM. The reasons given by the Senator from Wisconsin for asking me to withdraw this amendment are precisely those which induced me to offer it. My desire is that we shall legislate directly upon this question of the Sioux reservation; but I do not think it proper to pass this bill legislating upon that question now without the full consideration which it demands; and I want to make it an exception, and reserve it for specific action hereafter; and that is wherein I think this amendment is misunderstood. It is not that I wish now to settle definitely the question with reference to the Sioux reservation, but that I wish to take no action upon it now, so that we may hereafter fully consider it and specifically legislate upon it.

I have no objection myself to the modification suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not know whether my friend from Iowa has or not.

Mr. ALLISON. Not particularly.
Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I hope, so far as this bill is in the direction of punishing persons who unlawfully trespass upon the Indian territory, that it will be adopted. I, with some regret, heard it argued yesterday that we should not pass this bill protecting the Indians by punishing those who unlawfully enter upon their territory, because, forsooth, the Indians had violated some treaty, and therefore our people should be allowed to go in with the strong hand upon them and do as they please. Sir, we neither do justice to the Indians nor justice to the people of the United States or their Government when we yield to any such argument as that in treating with those who occupy the position toward us of these unfortunate Indian tribes.

Sir, I believe I speak what every one will recognize when I say that in the adjoining British territory there has not, in the memory of any one, been an Indian war; nay, it is said there has scarcely ever been a white man killed by Indians there. I think the reason is that the policy pursued by the government there has been wiser, juster, and firmer than ours. Unfortunately for this country and its Gov-ernment we are constantly having wars with the Indians, because ernment we are constantly having wars with the Indians, because they claim that they are wronged and that the Government does not protect them against wrong. I think that, if some Indian speaker could rise on this floor and give us the views of his people from their stand-point, he would claim that it was they who had been crowded and wronged by irresponsible parties, in violation of treaties and in violation of their rights, and that they had been thus wronged because our Government, when we set apart a territory for these people and agreed that they should have protection in it, has failed with the strong hand, as we ought to have done, to prevent our people going strong hand, as we ought to have done, to prevent our people going in there when the thirst for gold, or the thirst for anything else in the way of making money, sends a crowd there, unless we prevent it.

This bill simply prescribes that persons who are unlawfully upon the Indian territory, and who refuse to leave it when they are notified to do so, shall be punished in courts of law; at least that is one of its provisions. As the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary said, it prescribes certain penalties for violations of law in reference to the Indians and provides a court wherein such offenses can be punished. I think we should pass it, and I think we should pass it especially in justice to ourselves and our own people and our own Government. What are the arguments against it? It is said "You cannot execute this law; a thousand men have already gone, thirsty for gold, in violation of the laws of the United States and its thirsty for gold, in violation of the laws of the United States and its treaties, into the territory of the Sioux Indians, to dig gold; and you cannot stop them." Well, sir, I think we should at least impose penalties upon them and provide courts that shall try them; and I do not believe the day has yet come when we can afford to say "We will not enforce the laws in favor of these helpless, uneducated, barbarian people," if you choose to call them so, "as against our own citizens." We would do it, sir, if a strong government told us we must, and I am sure we will do it more willingly and more sternly and firmly when a feeble people, who are in some sense wards of ours are vicwhen a feeble people, who are in some sense wards of ours, are vic-tims of these unlawful intrusions.

It is said again, "They are violating the treaty." If it be so, our Government has taken no action in that direction; and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary well asked, "Can every man take it into his own hands to get even by plundering them of their timber or of their gold or anything else on their reservation?" No, sir; I know that the feeling throughout the country is that this story of the action of our people toward the Indians is a sad one, and one that we deeply regret. The feeling is that we should sternly enforce the law on the borders, and then there will be peace; but, if we here argue that, because we claim that the Indians have done something and our people have gone there lawlessly, we will not try to prevent it, of course we shall have Indian wars, and the vengeance of the uneducated savage, who really thinks he is vindicating his rights, will fall as usual, not on the bold trespasser, but on the defenseless people of the border.

I am in favor of saying firmly that we will pass every law which we think will prevent our people intruding upon Indian territory; and that we will do it, first, because it is just to this unfortunate race; and, secondly, because we owe it to ourselves as a great and strong people and a people that have not become deaf yet to the voice of those who call upon us to do our duty in protecting these people in their territory, because it is our duty to do it, and because it is wise policy to do it; for thus, in my judgment, we can have that peace which has been so fortunate for the Indians and so fortunate for the whites in the adjoining province of Canada. There they have no wars, because the government protects the Indians in their rights, hearkens to their complaints and remedies them or satisfies them that they are wrong, and does it in a fair, peaceful way, not saying, "We will do nothing, but let our people who are tempted by gold or anything else which will enable them to make money, intrude wrongfully on the territory of the Indians."

I hope we shall pass the bill, and then I will unite with the Senator from Wisconsin in taking up this subject of the Indian territory and seeing if we cannot show everybody that we will protect the Indians and repress our own people from violating their territory contrary to the rights of the Indians.

Mr. WINDOM. I have so often heard this comparison made between the treatment of Indians in the British possessions and our own that it has become to me something of "a thrice-told tale." I think that it has become to me something of "a thrice-told tale." I think the distinction is so clear that every one who has given attention to Indian affairs must understand it. It is not a difference in the legislation of the two countries upon Indian affairs, but it is a difference in the circumstances which surround the Indians in this country and in the British possessions. In this country, spite of all you can do, civilization will continue to pass westward and occupy the rich plains of our country. You cannot, if you try, prevent the American citizen from taking possession of these valuable lands. We never have tried to prevent it, and I think we never should.

But on the other hand in the British possessions there has been

But, on the other hand, in the British possessions there has been no such irritating cause as has existed in this country. No settlers press upon Indian hunting-grounds in the northwestern British posessions, but, on the contrary, the white men who have gone there for the last half century or more have been employes of the Hudson Bay Company largely, who went into that country as trappers and hunters and who furnished to the Indians ammunition and arms for hunting and who furnished to the Indians ammunition and arms for hunting and anything else that they wanted in pay for furs brought in by the Indians. The whole system in that country has been to work in connection with the Indian in the very line in which he chose to be employed. White men have gone there to help the Indians as hunters, and so long as they simply work with them, do not interfere with their hunting-grounds, but rather furnish them with material for hunting, there will be no Indian wars. That is the whole reason of the difference between the northwestern British possessions and our It is not because Canada or the British government has treated the Indian question more wisely than we, but it is owing to the difference in circumstances, which are beyond our control.

Now, sir, with reference to this treaty, a single word in answer to my friend from New York. Idonot admit that those who seek to except this territory are acting against the interest of the Indian or in violation of his rights. The history of the last three years in connection with this treaty shows that both parties, the United States and the Indians, have regarded the treaty as substantially inoperative. The Indians have so regarded it, because they bound themselves as solemnly as we to commit no trespass upon the whites; they bound themselves also to accept certain compensation, for which they were to keep the peace. That compensation was fully paid under the terms of the treaty, and for three years since the treaty has terminated the Indians have, as I said yesterday, demanded annually from Congress an appropriation of a million and a quarter of dollars to avoid war with them. They do not demand this under the treaty, but they demand it under threats of a continual violation of the treaty. Now, sir, I in-sist that both parties have treated it as substantially at an end; and while I do not wish to adjudicate that question on this bill, I do want to make an exception of the territory covered by the treaty, that we may take it up hereafter upon a bill prepared by the Indian Committee, and fully and carefully consider it, and act upon it as justice

There is another reason why I think we should not act hastily upon this bill. There are no law questions involved in it, no constitutional questions; it is wholly a question of Indian policy; and the bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the first place.

The short to have been considered by that committee, who are supported by the committee of the committee o It ought to have been considered by that committee, who are supposed to have most knowledge upon that subject. The Senator who introduced it is himself a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Why not then take it to the committee who decide all questions of Indian policy; and if this amendment shall fail, I shall try a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs before we vote on it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if I understand this bill it is to extend the criminal law, with certain exceptions, over the Territories of the United States and give to the courts of the United States jurisdiction to punish white men for offenses committed. The amendment is to except from the operation of this bill what is known as the Black Hills reservation. In my opinion, if the amendment is adopted the bill ought to be defeated, because to pass the bill with that exception, excepting from its operation the Black Hills reservation, will be understood by the whole country as an invitation to go there, that all restrictions are abolished, and that what has been declared to be illegal has become legal. That would certainly be the effect it would have. It would be so regarded by the country.

Now, I do not understand the law as the Senator from Minnesota expressed it yesterday. He said that this treaty is no longer binding, because the Indians had violated it, and therefore we are entitled to disregard it. I do not understand that to be the practice between nations that make treaties with each other. We cannot assume without giving cause of war a treaty to be nullified and no longer in existence with England because she may have violated that treaty in some respects. We are bound to call her attention to it; we are bound to insist upon its enforcement. We cannot ourselves, because we assume that she has violated that treaty, act as if it were null and void and utterly disregard it.

Mr. WINDOM. Suppose we have a treaty of peace with England in which each party agrees to preserve the peace and she makes an attack on us, may we consider it as at an end?

Mr. MORTON. I cannot discuss the particular thing the Senator refers to, because I do not understand precisely how it touches this point.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me, in answer to my friend from Minnesota, to suggest that the United States Government is not vindicating the breach of the treaty. The argument is that a set of men may go into this territory lawlessly, the Government never having declared the treaty void or taken any action, as my friend says. I do not stand for any action on the other side; but the Senator from Minnesota says white men have been killed, some lawless Indians have killed them. We cannot let them make war on each other. Suppose we have a treaty with Great Britain and some Americans invade Canada and do a wrong thing the Canada as could not instify coming back and in a wrong thing, the Canadians could not justify coming back and do a wrong thing, the Canadians could not justify coming back and invading our territory on that ground. The governments must deal with that matter, as my friend from Indiana argues.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think we can adopt such a rule with a civilized nation, and we ought not to adopt it with an ignorant people, a weak people, like these are. If they have violated the treaty and we have called their attention to it and insisted on their observance of it, we may then declare it to be disregarded, but we cannot justify the lawless violation of it by individuals.

But, Mr. President, I understand that the Government has regarded this treaty as being in force and has by the use of military power and has by proclamation endeavored to keep white men from going in there to dig gold. I understand that to be the history of the last three years, that proclamation has been made and that troops have been sent there, and that companies of miners have been ordered out from time to time. Thus we have assumed ourselves that it was illegal for white men to go upon that reservation for the purpose of digging gold. If we have ourselves assumed that to be the law and the treaty to be in force, we cannot disregard it at this time and in this

As I said before, if this amendment is adopted I shall then vote against the bill, because to except the Black Hills reservation from the general operation of the law is to say to the whole country, "You may go there without restriction." It is an invitation to go there; it is saying it is no longer illegal.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have paid very little attention to this bill; but having on one or two occasions taken upon myself to give my views in reference to the Indian policy, (though I do not intend to inflict my views on the Indian policy at this time upon the Senate,) I desire in the few moments I shall occupy to state, in an-Senate,) I desire in the few moments I shall occupy to state, in answer to what was said by the Senator from New York, that the wrongs complained of continually in reference to our conduct toward the Indians, or their conduct toward us, in my judgment originated in a false policy in the beginning of our treatment with the Indians. It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently recognized the power of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and I must bow to their opinions because they are the judges and expounders of the law of this country, but I reserve to myself the right to judge as to the policy that has been adopted by the country. The power to make treaties is by the Constitution of the United States granted to the President and the Senate; thereby granting power to the Executive of the nation, certainly meaning that he shall have power to make treaty stipulations with a nation. I cannot underpower to make treaty stipulations with a nation. I cannot understand, nor have I ever been able to understand, where the power stand, nor have I ever been able to understand, where the power was obtained to make treaty stipulations with Indian tribes; and yet that has been the rule adopted. We must conform ourselves to it. It has resulted in this wise: You make a treaty with an Indian tribe; say, for instance, the Sioux Indians. In a short time two or three of the principal chiefs have a difficulty and separate, and form two tribes. There then arises a necessity for a second treaty with the second tribe. We have gone on in that way treating with the Indian tribes until we have the reliev is each a condition to the property of the second tribes. dian tribes, until we have the policy in such a condition that no man can understand it.

My friends from Iowa and Minnesota insist that to this bill, and I shall not discuss the policy any further, the Black Hills reservation must be made an exception. I have heard no good reason given to the Senate yet why that should be made an exception, unless it is upon the Senate yet why that should be made an exception, unless it is upon the principle that we are to say to all the people except the Indians, "Go; steal nowhere save in the Black Hills." That is the meaning of the amendment. All men except Indians are prohibited from stealing timber, or taking it off—perhaps that is a better term—or grass from all the reservations save the Black Hills reservation. Why should it be reserved? In other words, say to your neighbor, "Steal from every other neighbor's turnip-patch, but save mine." That is all I can see in the argument. If it is right to extend the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over the different Territories and reservations made known as reservations to the Indians, it is equally corrected. ervations made known as reservations to the Indians, it is equally correct and right to extend the jurisdiction over all if it is extended for the purpose of preventing crime.

I might make a further objection to this bill. We extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts over the Territories wherein it has not been extended, for the purpose of deciding in reference to the violation of criminal laws. It applies alone to persons other than Indians. If an offense is committed by one Indian upon another Indian, the criminal law under this bill does not apply. I would go further. I would say that those tribes that are partially civilized, that are so far educated in civilization as to have it made known to them that these offenses committed frequently by them are violations of the law, should be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts the same as the ignorant man other than an Indian.

as the ignorant man other than an indian.

There is one other thing, perhaps not pertinent to this bill, that I desire to say, and perhaps there will be no better occasion afforded to say it than this. I see from the press of the country, and in fact from the action of a portion of the members of the other branch of Congress, and from what I have heard intimated as the opinion of some of the Senators in this branch of Congress, that in order that we shall have peace between the Indians and the white people, in order that we shall have quiet and good order on the reservations, it is determined, or at least spoken of, (and I am ready to believe perhaps intended to be done,) that the Indian Bureau with all the Indians shall be turned over to that the Indian Bureau with all the Indians shall be turned over to the War Department. To teach Indians peace they are to be turned over into the hands of men who are taught only war. To teach them civilization they are to be placed under the control of men who are taught to exercise that which belongs to barbarism and not to civilization. War is force. War is barbarism. War is not civilization. It is not peace and not quiet, and it is not calculated to bring peace to the hearths of the people in any country. I wish to announce now, and once for all perhaps, that I am utterly opposed to any such proposition. If I have come to the point that I must say that all men are dishonest, that we intend to prove by the action of Congress that each honest, that we intend to prove by the action of Congress that each and every man in this country is a dishonest man, not capable of performing his duties honestly under the law unless he be trained in the arts of war and military discipline, while others may acknowledge this,

I hope to be excused from making any such acknowledgment.

I know what I have said in this respect is out of the line of the argumentation on this bill, but I thought it as well to say it here as anywhere else. I am in favor of extending the jurisdiction of the courts over all the Territories of the United States and I am in favor of trying questions of law by the judges of the law. I am opposed to the decision of the questions covered by this bill in any other way than by judicial course of proceedings; and as fast as the Indians arrive at the point that they themselves may be adjudged as other men I would extend the same jurisdiction over them in reference to their course of conduct and acts under the law toward one another as I would to those outside of the Indian tribes toward them. I believe the way to keep peace with the Indians is to treat them as they are treated in the Canadas; treat them in a peaceful and proper way; deal justly and honestly by them; teach them to observe and fear the rules and regulations of Government the same as we teach our own citizens to fear our laws and our regulations. As far as you can teach them in that line, do so. Teach them not the arts of war, but civil pursuits; educate them; christianize them, as far as it is possible to do so. I believe that, if the declared policy of this Administration had been strictly complied with and carried out as fairly as it should have been, if no obstacles had been thrown in the way, it would have opened the road to peace and reconciliation between the Indian tribes and the other people of this country. But so long as they understand that there is no law by which their country is to be regulated, that they are only subject to force, that they are only subjects to be driven by the armies of the United States or to be made to obey by force without any other appliance, just so long will you have trouble in governing the Indian tribes or any other class of people that are of a savage nature.

Having said this much, sir, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, but am in favor of the bill as it has been presented by the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is amazing how great a flame a little spark sometimes kindleth. This bill is based upon principles that commend themselves to the judgment of every member of the Senate. No one who has spoken upon it has denied that the principles which are here sought to be effectuated are just. No one has claimed that any new idea is attempted to be enforced that any new cipies which are here sought to be electuated are just. No one has claimed that any new idea is attempted to be enforced, that any new crime is defined, that any addition has been made to the criminal jurisprudence of this country. Everybody admits that all that is sought by this bill is simply to provide a tribunal in which wrongs and crimes that are already defined and admitted to exist may be punished and where the penalties that attach to infractions of law care be enforced.

The Senator from Maine last evening, in some remarks that he made, honored me overmuch. He congratulated me on having made one step in favor of justice to the Indian. Sir, I profess that, in introducing this bill and advocating its passage, I am actuated by no sentiments of philanthropy toward the red man. This bill is in favor of the white man, for justice to the Indian is the only security to the settlers on the frontiers of the West. The Indian, Mr. President, ranks very high in the malign and destructive agencies of nature. He is the embodiment of an evil and ill-directed energy. He is a sort of moral dynamite, that is liable to explode on very slight handling, and inflict inexplicable and indescribable ruin, not on those who have disturbed or infringed his rights, but upon the innocent and the unoffending.

The amendment that is offered by the Senator from Minnesota, to except that portion of the Sioux reservation known as the Black Hills from the operation of this law, is simply to invite every lawless and irresponsible adventurer in the United States to go into that res ervation immediately without further notice. That is the practical, immediate, affirmative effect. It is a declaration of the Senate of the United States to those who are now in that reservation that they are there with our consent; and it is an invitation to those who desire to follow them, to do so, with the assurance, so far as we can give it, that they shall not be disturbed in their attempt to interfere with the rights of those Indians, if they have any.

But, as I said, it is not with me a question between the Indian and the white man. I have nothing to say, so far as the settlers in the Sioux reservation among the Black Hills are concerned, one way or the other, as between them and the Indians. If there is gold there, if there are treasures of timber there, if there were nothing but the rights of the Indians to be considered, I should be very glad for them to obtain what they seek; but there are other considerations of a much more important character than these. I was surprised to hear the sentiments advanced by the Senator from Minnesota yesterday in regard to the rights of the United States and the obligation of the United States as between the Sioux and the settlers or the gold-seekers upon that reservation. I understood him to say that there had been such a neglect of the treaty stipulations on the part of the Sioux Indians as to amount to a practical abrogation, and that by that fact alone these persons were authorized and empowered to go in there and occupy that country; and he instanced as violations of the treaty the murder of white settlers, the interference with emigrants, and the demand of a million and a quarter of dollars annually for the purpose of avoiding the dangers of war.

It certainly is a very novel and extraordinary proposition to maintain on this floor that when a treaty of peace, amity, and concord has been made between two nations, the wrongful or illegal or tortuous acts of a few individuals result in an abrogation of that treaty. We have treaties of peace, good-will, concord, and amity with Great Britain. Suppose that English burglars land upon the Battery at New York and ply their trade in that city, break open stores, burn dwelling-houses, and plunder the inhabitants; is that such a violation of the treaty as would authorize the authorities of New York or the citizens of New York to go into the harbor and seize all the British shipping there? Could they seize the property of British residents in that city because there had been a violation of private rights by a few irresponsible British subjects?

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question ? Mr. INGALLS.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir. Mr. McMILLAN. Have the chiefs of the Indian tribes surrendered to justice any of the persons committing any of those atrocities, or have they made any attempt to do so?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know that any demand has been made upon them to do so. I cannot answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota because I have no facts upon which to base an opinion. I was merely arguing upon the general principle that there had been, in accordance with the declarations of the Senator's colleague, such an abrogation of the treaty of 1868 between General Sherman and the other commissioners and three hundred representatives of the Sioux nation, that that reservation was now open to white settlement practically—a proposition so monstrous and so fraught with dangers to the inhabitants of the frontier in all the States and Territories around that reservation that I am surprised to hear it announced on this floor.

Why, sir, what is the practical result of the presence of those gold-seekers in the Black Hills reservation to-day? It is a standing men-ace and a standing threat to every pioneer settler and to every frontiersman in the States of Kansas and Nebraska and the Territories of Dakota and Wyoming, and every portion of country that is accessible to those men within a period of time before they can be restrained by a military force. The Sioux are the most implacable, the most blood-thirsty, the most truculent of all the Indian nations now upon this continent. They number some fifty thousand, of whom at least ten thousand have never been near an agency to draw their rations. They are the wild, blanketed, uncontrollable Indians of the frontier uncontrolled by law, uncontrolled by anything except the presence of a superior force.

What relation, then, to the peace and safety of the frontier does the presence of these invaders in that Black Hills region possess? The Indians, already irritated by the partial occupation of that country, already irritated by the military explorations of that country under Custer and those who have preceded him, are, as we are informed, already upon the war-path. It is a matter of public notoriety, noted in the public prints, that Sitting Bull and some of his warriors already have commenced operations on the Vallowstone, pear Fort Pages and in the public prints, that Sitting Bull and some of his warriors already have commenced operations on the Yellowstone, near Fort Pease, and have commenced murdering emigrants and others passing properly through that country. Unless some measures are taken to allay this irritation, unless something is done to prevent the difficulty that threatens, I can only say that in my opinion the result will be one of infinite expense and one of infinite disaster to the American people.

I do not know what the objective point is, or what the purpose is, of the military expedition that has already moved into that country. It is secret; its objects have not been disclosed; but everybody knows that within the past few days a military expedition, under a general of distinction, has moved from one of the posts on the Union Pacific Railroad northward through this reservation.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me a word?
Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.
Mr. PADDOCK. I will state that I understand from the Secretary of the Interior that the chief cause of irritation is that there was a misunderstanding with reference to the period of time during which the supplies should be furnished to these Indians; the Indians supposing that it was to continue indefinitely; the Government, that it was only to continue for a period of four years, which term has expired. The Government refused to make any additional appropriation for supplies; the Indians are without sustenance; there is no money with which to defray the expenses of providing sustenance for them; and it is that cause of irritation which the Government apprehends that has led it to take the course it has taken in reference to anticipating difficulties.

Mr. INGALLS. This expedition has been in contemplation for the last four or five months.

Mr. PADDOCK. The deficiency has existed four or five months.

Mr. INGALLS. The commanders of the forces have been here in consultation with the military authorities. A force has been organized and has moved into that country, whether for the purpose of repressing the Indiaus, dispossessing the gold-seekers in the Black Hills, or protecting the settlers, nobody knows; but it is at least very clearly and positively ascertained that the primary cause of the irritation that now exists among those Indians is the occupation of their possessions by the gold-seekers in the Black Hills; and the result of that is that those men, a thousand or fifteen hundred as the Senator from Iowa yesterday said, are allowed to entail an expense of millions of dollars on the Treasury of this Government, and, beyond that, allowed to threaten the peace and tranquillity and prosperity of the whole frontier of the country that surrounds them. Sir, do these men present themselves before the Senate or before the country in the attitude of demanding our consideration or protection? I speak for the citizens of my own State; I speak for the settlers on the frontier of Kansas and on the frontier of Nebraska, who will be the first victims of an Indian massacre if this matter is allowed to go on, because every Senator familiar with the condition of affairs in the West knows that in those isolated, detached, and remote localities, when the rumors of Indian warfare or Indian massacre first commence to disturb them, hundreds of square miles are immediately depopulated; men, women, and children, without the presence of actual danger, abandon their farms, abandon their little hamlets, abandon their little settlements, and flee for protection into those countries which are more thickly settled where opportunities for defense can be obtained.

So, sir, I say that while, were it a question between the settlers in the Black Hills and the Indians, I should be comparatively indifferent, yet when protection is asked for these men upon the ground that they are legally in that reservation, I feel called upon to repudiate the assertion, and to say that they are in the attitude of law-breakers, in the attitude of violators of treaties and of statutes, that places them in a position which requires our condemnation rather than our approbation.

I hope therefore that this bill will pass, and pass without the amendment. It is due to the people of the West as a measure of security; it is due to the Indians themselves as a measure of justice; and it is due to this body as a measure of absolute right.

Mr. OGLESBY. May I ask the honorable Senator one question, before he takes his seat, in explanation of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I have concluded.
Mr. OGLESBY. The bill provides that—

The general laws of the United States as to the punishment of crimes committed in any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, except the District of Columbia, shall be in force in and upon each and every Indian reservation established by law or treaty stipulation within the limits of any Territory of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend the jurisdiction of said courts to offenses committed upon such reservation by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian.

Then section 2, which is the penal clause, provides-

That any person not an Indian who shall cut, or remove, or in any manner carry away any wood, trees, or timber of any kind, &c.

Any person not an Indian who shall commit this trespass upon the reservations shall be subject to the penalty provided. Why are not Indians excluded ? It prohibits all persons except Indians doing these things. I can understand why an Indian upon the particular reservation should be excepted. I can understand that the Indians of the tribe settled on that reservation should be excepted; but why except other Indians not belonging on that reservation from the penalties of this second section? If they commit depredations, if they cut and this second section? If they commit depredations, it they cut and carry away timber or other materials, or if white men, through other Indians not belonging to that tribe, shall by connivance and fraud carry off valuable materials from the reservation, why should not the other Indians not belonging to that tribe be subject to the penalties imposed by thissection? This section excludes all Indians, as I understand it. It strikes me that it ought only to exclude the Indians on the reservation, because Indians not on the reservation might be used for purposes of depredation upon it. I ask the honorable Senator to explain why it is that they are excluded from the section. Senator to explain why it is that they are excluded from the section. I do not know that there is much in it. The treaty with the Sioux tribe compels the Government of the United States to keep all persons off, not all white people, but all persons, so that the United States under the treaty with the Sioux, as I understand it, are under obligation to keep off the reservation Indians belonging to other tribes, as well as white people. It strikes me, therefore, that Indians ought not to be excluded, except the Indians on the reserva-

Mr. INGALLS. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois in relation to the provisions of the second section, I will only state that the objection he urges appears to be without foundation for various reasons. In the first place, the Indian reservations are generated. various reasons. In the first place, the indianteservations are generally so widely separated that no possible difficulty could arise by the trespasses or depredations of one Indian upon the domain of another tribe; and, in the next place, no complaints based upon difficulties of this description that seemed to require any action have ever been brought to the notice of the committee.

One objection that I omitted to notice when I was addressing myself to the bill before was that it would be entirely nugatory. I am reminded of what the Senator from Iowa said and the illustration that he used from Mrs. Glass's Cook-Book in relation to the method of making a hare-stew, I think it is called. She says, "First catch your hare." I was rather surprised at the remark of the Senator when he inquired, "How are you going to catch your hare?" for I understood that they came very near catching his hair last summer, so that I supposed there could be no special trouble about catching hares in

It is certainly a very poor argument to use against a bill which every-body admits to be just and proper in its provisions, that an illegal and unwarrantable combination of persons exists in certain portions of the country affected by the bill which it will require some difficulty or some trouble to overcome.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the Senator think it would be a good thing to send a bald-headed committee out there?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois suggests that it might be well to send a bald-headed committee. There would then be more difficulty in catching hares. But, seriously, I suppose the Senator from Iowa did not intend to urge this as an argument against the pasfrom lowa did not intend to urge this as an argument against the passage of the bill. If a person is arrested under the provisions of this act in the Black Hills and taken before a commissioner and examined and bound over to appear before the court having jurisdiction, if there is any resistance to the process of the court, it would be very easy to summon a posse comitatus, and, if that is resisted, to call, as the Constitution provides, upon the militia, and finally upon the military authority of the United States.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will state to the Senator the reason why I called attention to that provision. He stated that there was no occasion for including Indians in this penalty except those on the reservation; that there was no complaint. I call his attention to an instance recently brought before the Committee on Indians Affairs, of which he is a member, where it was shown by testimony before that committee that the Pawnees, who occupied a reservation a hundred miles west of Omaha in the State of Nebraska, were driven from their reservation into the Indian country, according to their allegation, on account of inroads, incursions, and depredations upon them by this very same Sioux tribe.

Mr. HOWE. When?

Mr. OGLESBY. They moved within the last year or two.
Mr. PADDOCK. It has been a matter of frequent occurrence.

Mr. OGLESBY. It coming into my mind that Indians sometimes go upon other reservations and commit depredations upon tribes that we have placed there for preservation, and this particular treaty with the Sioux providing that the United States shall keep all persons off, it struck me that it would be no more than a just provision in this bill to include the Indians of other reservations who may commit depredations upon reservations where they have no right; and I think an amendment ought to be made to that effect.

Mr. INGALLS. I remember the allegation being made before the Committee on Indian Affairs by some person, whose name I do not now recall, that trespasses and depredations had been committed on the Pawnee reservation by individuals of the Sioux Nation; but it seemed to me that those allegations were made rather as arguments to show from what the necessity arose for the expenditure of a very show from what the necessity arose to the experience of a very large sum of money in removing the Pawnee Indians from Nebraska to the Indian Territory, and I will say to the Senator that I did not attach much importance to those representations. The Senator from Nebraska, however, says that those matters are of very frequent occurrence, and as he lives in the State where both these reservations are situated, one entirely and the other partially, his statements are entitled to great weight, and of course I presume he is entirely familiar with the facts that he alleges. But there will be this difficulty attending the attempt to extend jurisdiction over controversies between the Indians of different tribes: We have in our policy regarded all these Indians as separate and independent nations. We have treated with them as such. They have tribal organizations that make them separate in the separate in rate and distinct almost as much as any two nations can be; and to make them subject to the jurisdiction of our courts would be really attempting to enforce authority over parties who belong to different nations, neither of them citizens of the United States. I therefore think it would be impolitic as well as unnecessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to prolong the debate upon this bill, but I was led into an error yesterday by the Senator from Kansas, and I think I ought to endeavor at least to correct it briefly this morning. The Senator from Kansas yesterday urged the adoption of the first section of this bill because section 2145 of the Revised Statutes only applied to the Indian Territory proper. For the moment, supposing he had examined that question carefully, I accepted his interpretation and rather apologized to him for making that criticism upon the bill; but, having examined the question subsequently, I find that section 2145 of the Revised Statutes not only applies to the Indian Territory proper but practically to all the Indian reservations.

There may be possibly a few Indian reservations to which it does not apply, but the uniform interpretation of the several provisions of the Revised Statutes in which "the Indian country" is mentioned is that it applies to all the Indian reservations. If the Senator from Kansas will take the trouble to examine chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes he will find that in all the penal laws the words "Indian country" are used. The "Indian country" was first defined in an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier, passed in 1834, which is as follows:

That all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the States of Missouri and Louisiana or the Territory of Arkansas, and also that part of the United States east of the Mississippi River, and not within any State, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, for the purposes of this act be taken and deemed to be the Indian country.

That construction has been followed up by every statute since-From that time to the present these laws have been held to apply to every Indian reservation; so that the first section, as I understand it and as it is understood by the Department, applies now to the Sioux reservation. If this first section were not enacted at all, there is power under existing laws to punish the people who have gone upon that reservation in violation of the treaty of 1888. Of course, that punishment is not the same punishment which is provided in the second and third sections of this bill; it is a different punishment; but they are subject to the laws of the United States the same as the Indians within the Indian Territory proper. Having fallen into that error yesterday, I wish to correct it this morning, so that there can be no objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconbe no objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin who proposes to except the first section from the operation of the proviso offered by the Senator from Minnesota. The first section is the law to-day of the Sioux reservation, and you do not add to it one jot or tittle by passing the first section of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. Where is the law?

Mr. ALLISON. In section 2145 of the Revised Statutes. It is so held by the Attorney-General, and so held by all the Departments and acted upon to-day. All the laws with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors and with reference to punishments on Indian reservations apply to the Sioux reservation to-day the same as they will apply after this first section becomes a law.

The second and third sections are valuable in this, that they provide a different penalty and a different punishment from any existing As I understand it, there is no law now punishing persons who law. As I understand it, there is no law now punishing persons who cut timber from Indian reservations or who remove from Indian reservations timber, stone, or other material. So the third section provides "that any person found upon any Indian reservation contrary to law, and who shall refuse or neglect, &c., shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and be punished. The only difference between this section and the existing law is, that to-day persons found upon Indian reservations cannot be punished until they are notified to remove. There must be one notification to leave the reservation before the laws manishing them can be enforced. This bill provides that they shall be punishing them can be enforced. This bill provides that they shall be at once punished; and of course these two sections will apply to the Sioux reservations and every other. They are new sections, and provide different and other punishment from what are now provided by law. That is the only value I see in the bill. This first section may apply to one or two small reservations east of the Mississippi, or possibly to some reservations in California.

With reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas, I did not urge as a reason for not passing this bill that it would be inoperative as against the miners of the Black Hills. I only stated that it would not affect that question. That is all I meant to say. I do not believe it can affect them. After this bill is passed, should it be passed as now reported by the committee, those miners will pay no more attention to it than they do to the existing law which punishes them for being found on the Sioux reservation. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, because I believe we should pass some act having reference solely to that reservation, but I regard it as of no particular value one way or the other.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask my honorable friend a question. I do not ask him to answer me just at this moment, but I address the remark to him. I speak with reference to the last statement he makes, that he will vote for the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota, which is to except from the operation of this act the present condition of things in the Black Hills country. Before that is acted upon, it is worth while for us to consider what that condition of things apon, it is worth while for us to consider what that condition of things is and how far by any implication we are willing by an act of Congress to tolerate that condition of things. If the newspapers are to be trusted and if information from private sources is at all to be relied upon, large bodies of men, who I need not characterize, men who float upon the border, men of enterprising notions, are going into that country. There is no doubt about that fact. There is no doubt about the fact that we are in danger daily of a collision between the Indians and those people. The Government taking cognizance of that fact, the military authorities are on the march with troops to interpose. How? Of course against the Indians. There you have an incipient Indian war on your hand produced by these men.

Mr. ALLISON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question in turn, before I answer him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator expect that sections 2 and 3 of this bill will in the slightest degree affect that question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I said yesterday that I had not the slightest idea it would. Those men will go there. There is no power on earth I know of that will prevent them; but we are not legislating against those men. This act is general in its character; and the proposition is here made to upset the operation of a general principle in behalf of a body of men who are creating disorder and bringing on war on the border.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator misapprehends my reason. Not on

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not understand my honorable friend to assume that, but my argument is that that is the inevitable result of it. That being the condition of things, if the Congress of the United States so far tolerates that condition of things as to except those people from the operation of a general law, it is a permission for them to go there. The implication of it is inevitable. "Go on; go into the Black Hills from all quarters; so far as the Congress of the United States is concerned, it not only looks on calmly and does not rebuke you, but it excepts you from any penalties which shall apply everywhere else." That will be the implication beyond all question.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me a moment? Does it not leave the law operative which the Senator from Maine quoted and which he said was more severe than this?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely. It leaves that operative, but why should not this be operative? It is an invitation for these men to go, when it is taken in connection with the fact that my honorable friend from Minnesota stated vesterday that the Government had looked on with indifference and had not admonished them. If you make them an exception now, you invite them to go. That is the moral effect of it. It is an absolute invitation. We look on; we know moral effect of it. It is an absolute invitation. We look on; we know what is being done. These lawless men are going in there in great numbers. They know the peril to the peace of the country; the troops are on the march to-day; and we propose to make known to the people on the border, to the troops, and to the Indians, that we tolerate the whole thing. Nay, we invite it by exempting these men from the conditions which are made to apply to law-abiding men everywhere else. I submit that is the moral effect of this anyway. While I do not attach any special importance to it as applying to those people and do not suppose a single prosecution will be made under it, at the same time it strikes me that legislation of this description upon a bill with such facts as these before us will have a most disastrons a bill with such facts as these before us will have a most disastrous

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me that that is the precise point involved in this amendment. Men have gone there in defiance of a proclamation, knowing it to be unlawful, and perhaps you cannot keep them out; but when you pass a law of this kind and except the Black Hills reservation from it, that will be a proclamation to the whole country that people may go there, and you will have fifty men there where you have only one now. But I want to call the attention of the Senate to a passage in the third section of the bill, and inquire of the Senator from Kansas what is the precise idea: Senator from Kansas what is the precise idea:

Any person found upon any Indian reservation contrary to law, and who shall refuse or neglect to remove therefrom upon the request of the agent or superintendent having charge of the reserve, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, &c.

Why require this notice to be given before the person can be held responsible ! Every man who goes there, unless he is very ignorant, knows that he is going in violation of the law and in violation of the rights of the Indians. This provision in effect legalizes his presence there as long as he can avoid coming in contact with the Indian agent or superintendent. There is a vast country. He may dodge the agent for three months, or six months, or even a year; and as long as he can dodge the agent or the superintendent his presence there is lawful under this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can explain briefly one reason why that should be done. I at least can give a reason why it should be done at the Red Cloud agency, where I was reason why it should be done at the field Cloud agency, where I was last year. All the supplies for that agency are carted from Cheyenne, and teamsters are there in large numbers. Sometimes forty men driving teams will come in there in a single night. They claim to be there lawfully, but in that way a great many people get in there who have no business and no right there. Every man you see at an Indian agency will be a teamster or will have apparently some lawful business and in vice cases out of tay he could prove that he was ess there, and in nine cases out of ten he could prove that he was there lawfully.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. MORTON. Then that becomes a question of fact. If a man goes there with supplies in a Government train he is there lawfully; but the third section provides that although he goes unlawfully, with no legitimate business, knowing that he is violating the law and violating the rights of the Indians, still he is held irresponsible and violating the rights of the Indians, still he is not inverted at until after he has been notified by the agent or superintendent. It seems to me that that opens a very wide door. Under this bill a military commander could not order him out. It could only be done by the Indian agent or superintendent, and if the commander of the forces orders him away he is not bound to go. The right to order him out, the right to punish him, under this bill depends upon the request of the Indian agent or superintendent.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether he thinks that, as the law stands now, or as it would stand with an amendment such as he suggests, if he or I were crossing the plains and should ignorantly or inadvertently pass across an Indian reservation, we ought to be punished without some notice or warning given to us that we were trespassing upon a reserved domain? I am sure the Senator does not think that; and if he does not think so, then I suggest to him that either this mode or some equivalent mode is necessary to charge wholly innocent and ignorant persons with notice before penalty should be inflicted upon them, especially in a country not marked by metes or bounds, where the lines are invisible and are known only to persons particularly accustomed to

Mr. MORTON. I do not know that a mere passing through would be regarded as a technical violation of the law. Perhaps it would; but it must be observed that this section makes all persons in the Black Hills or anywhere else in Indian country depend absolutely upon the will of the Indian agent. If he is corrupt, or if he is igno-npon the will of the Indian agent. If he is corrupt, or if he is ignorant, or if he is negligent, a man can go and stay there five years and there is no punishment for it. The illegality of it depends entirely upon a request to leave by the Indian agent or superintendent.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me once more, this is not a section declaring what is lawful or unlawful. It is a punitive section. It is a section to visit penalties upon the doer of a certain act. Surely, the Senator from Indiana does not mean that in the case he has just considered himself, of an inadvertent trespass, we should not only declare that unlawful as the law now declares it unlawful he has just considered himself, of an inadvertent trespass, we should not only declare that unlawful as the law now declares it unlawful, but proceed ipso facto to follow it with a penalty.

Mr. MORTON. If there is no penalty to the violation of the law, you may say there is no violation. Technically there is; but it amounts to nothing. If there is no penalty for going into the Indian country, men will go there although it is unlawful. The penalty is what we have the law offection, and here the penalty is made to depend what makes the law effective; and here the penalty is made to depend entirely upon the action of an Indian agent or superintendent who may be corrupt, or ignorant, or negligent, or five hundred miles away. It is opening the broadest possible door to corruption, and it seems to me you might just about as well have no law at all.

Mr. CONKLING. The answer still again to the Senator from Indiana seems to me to be this: No penalty can be visited upon me for walking into his close or yard in the city of Indianapolis. It is unlawful for me to do so unless I have a license. I am a trespasser. I can be sued for every trespass. No penalty is inflicted upon me because water drops from my eave upon his close, but in the language of an old case, every fresh drop of water is a fresh trespass for which he can sue me. But when you come to penal enactments, when you come to visit me with fine or imprisonment, then you ought to have something more than the mere fact that inadvertently, or even purposely, I have stepped upon the Senator's close. Therefore I call his attention to the broad distinction between a law which should declare, as the laws establishing Indian reservations already declare, that it is unlawful to invade them, and a law which visits with a defined and heavy penalty such a trespass. In the one case it is safe to leave the parties to suggest the excuses and mitigations; but in the other case, when you attach a penalty to an act, the intent should be present, the animus, the refusal to go or the intentional coming, that something which makes up the body of an act which Christian governments punish heavily.
Mr. MORTON.

The plain answer to that is that it is of no importance to make it unlawful to go into the Indian country unless there is some penalty for going there. Every man is presumed to know the law in regard to minor as well as great offenses, and he is held responsible accordingly. That is the universal maxim of the law in this country and in every other; and that a man should wander off into an Indian reservation and be presumed to be ignorant of the law until an Indian agent finds him out through a trackless wilderness and warns him to go away, it seems to me, would be virtually to destroy the law altogether. When my premises are invaded the law is violated, and the penalty attaches, although I have not informed the trespasser that I want him to leave. Now, this provision simply amounts to this: It looks to me like a trap-door, through which everything can pass; that men may go into the Black Hills or any everything can pass; that men may go into the Biack Hills of any other Indian country and do what they please, and nobody has a right to warn them off, and they cannot be punished for going there unless the Indian agent requests them to leave. Under the language of this law even a military commander cannot do it. Nobody but the Indian agent can make it unlawful. Therefore the punitive nature of the transaction, in substance, its lawfulness, is made to depend entirely upon an Indian agent. That those agents are notoriously men of interest and always the substance of the substanc tegrity and always do their duty, of course we take for granted; but here the whole question of violating the Indian country is made to depend upon the notice of an Indian agent.

Mr. HOWE. It is true that if I go on to the Senator's farm without his permission, I am liable. How? To pay him whatever damages that entry occasions him, of course. I am not a criminal; the statute does not put me down as a criminal, because I do that thing; but if I do him any damage I must make good that damage; that is all. These Indian reservations are surrounded by our own territories. We do not want to make it criminal for a man to enter upon an Indian reservation. He will not go there except as a matter of necessity, unless he has permission by the law to stay with impunity. It is a necessity that we must all go there some time. Scarcely a year passes over my head that I do not go of necessity into an Indian reservation.

There happens to be one near my own residence. I do not go there to All we want is some law under which we can punish men who go there to stay, and stay there in defiance of your command. The law says that you can send the Army after them and take them off, and then if they go back again you can sue them and get judgment against them for a thousand dollars. Yes; but what is your judgment good for? That is not commercial paper. That could not be negotiated, even on a full money market. That is worth nothing. You must have a statute by which you can punish them criminally. I know now of a handful of citizen reciding on an Indian recentation. Then now of a handful of citizens residing on an Indian reservation. have been removed off time and time again. They told the marshal of the United States, a few years ago, "You can take us off; we will go if you say so; but we will come back to-morrow;" and so they did. You cannot afford to remove men day after day; but when your law says to them that if they come back, or if they refuse to go when they are told to go off, they shall be liable to a fine and to imprisonment, then they will go and they will go to stay off the reservation and not come back on it. I assure the Senator from Indiana that there is not come back on it. I assure the Senator from Indiana that there is not the slightest danger to be apprehended of any injury to Indians by leaving this section as it is. If the Indian agent refuses to give the notice we can remove the agent; but he will give the notice. They are all mighty glad to give such notices as this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

The question being put, a division was asked for; and the ayes

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota insist upon a further count?

Mr. WINDOM. I feel less like insisting upon it for the reason that several Senators who have spoken on this subject have indicated that this was a less severe penalty than was now inflicted upon those people, and as this new law, if passed, will probably take the place of the old one, I am quite willing that these men upon the Black Hills shall be left to the justice of the peace rather than to the Army of the United States. Therefore I do not insist upon a further division; but I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. if should have been considered by that committee originally. It involves no question of law, no question of constitutional construction, but is wholly a question of Indian policy. I move its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves the commitment of the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I trust that course will not be taken. I think there has been a sufficient expression from the members of the Indian Committee upon the floor to justify me in saying that but one course would be pursued. Therefore the only result would be procrastination and delay; and inasmuch as the whole subject has been debated pro and con, and the Senate is at the present time fully in possession of the views that ought to guide them in its determination, I venture to express the hope that the bill may now be voted upon, and not referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think there is great force in what has been said by the Senator from Indiana. I have not as much faith in Indian agents as some other people may have. Men who leave their homes to go among savages to serve for $600 a year I do not think are the class of men to whom we want to give such great power. These Indian agents are the men who are to make these misdemeanors attach to those who go into Indian territory. If any of their friends should go in there and they do not see proper to notify them to go off, they are all right; but if some other persons not friendly with them, who commit no greater offense, come in for the same purpose they are notified to leave, and if they do not leave then the misdemeanor attaches under this proposed law.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?
On consultation with the Senator from Iowa I have already agreed with him upon the propriety of amending the third section so as to require the notice to be given by the President instead of by the agent, thus vesting the discretion in the President instead of the agent. Mr. CLAYTON. Then it seems to me the whole thing becomes merely nugatory unless men should go in large bodies and remain I suppose in that case the amendment might be well enough; but if the intention of the bill is to apply to individuals who go upon these reservations or to very small bodies of men, it seems to me the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin would have no practical effect.

Mr. HOWE. You should not expect the President to go out there in person and notify them.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; but he must know they are there. It takes long while to communicate with a distant Indian reservation. Men could get there and remain for six months before the President could get his information and his order get back. During that time a great deal of damage might be done. I think that this bill is imperfect. I cannot help thinking so. I was rather impressed at first with its justice and was disposed to vote for it, but it seems to me it is imperfect, especially because it opens the door for what already attaches to this Indian question—fraud on the part of Indian agents.

I should dislike very much to give this power into the hands of individuals of that character. I rather think the best thing that can be done is to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. All human things are imperfect; and of course this bill, which the Senator from Arkansas characterizes as not being all that he could desire, is liable probably to that imputation. that he could desire, is hable probably to that imputation. But in relation to the particular point that he alleges, which was first suggested by the Senator from Indiana, I beg to say that this section is merely supplemental to powers that already exist. If the Senator will turn to the Revised Statutes, page 376, section 2149, he will find that in case of the continued occupation of a tribal reservation by individuals or by bodies of persons without authority whose presence there is detrimental, "the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to remove them; and for that purpose he may employ such force as may be necessary" to accomplish this result. The authority that the Senator from Indiana desires should be vested in some person is already vested by the Revised Statutes in the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and they are authorized, when the continued presence either of individuals or of associations of men becomes detrimental to the interests of the Indian or of the Government, to cause their removal by force. I cannot perceive that there is any difficulty liable to result from reposing this discretion in the agent or superintendent. It must certainly be reposed somewhere; and a large proportion of our governmental functions are based upon the idea that some men at least are honest and worthy of confidence.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator from Kansas misapprehends the point that I made, or attempted to make. As he says, the law now authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under him, to remove trespassers from reservations; but it has been found that that is not effectual; therefore it is now proposed to extend the criminal laws of the United States over these territories and make these trespassers liable to indictment, so as to put these reservations under the protection of grand juries; and yet that is crippled and in effect destroyed by making it penal only after an Indian agent has notified the trespasser to leave.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me to state that all the intercourse and communication between two very populous counties in my State lies over an Indian reservation, the only possible thoroughfare, and it is a highway through the State. I should like to know if the Senator would think it to be a wise, proper, and judicious thing to subject every citizen of those counties who passes over that reservation to indictment?

Mr. MORTON. I should say to my friend that the proper way to meet that is to make an exception in the law and say it shall not be unlawful to cross an Indian reservation in transit from one county to another or from one Territory to another. But I call attention to this, that the unlawful entry upon any Indian territory is made to depend upon the notice of an Indian agent; and, if he is a corrupt man, (and agents have sometimes been found to be corrupt, I am told,) he can simply admit his friends into the Black Hills, and exclude everybody else; he can make every gold-hunter tributary to himself; those that do not pay tribute he will notify to leave, and have them indicted if they do not, while those that pay tribute or in some way compensate him get no notice. That is the effect of it. With this provision in the bill I would not vote for it under any circumstances. I think it is a temptation to corruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question being put, a division was called for—and the ayes

Mr. INGALLS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I would not spend a moment in opposing the reference of this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs if it were not for ence of this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs if it were not for one single thing, and that is: I am ashamed to have such a vote transpire in the Senate. Just see what these propositions are. The first section extends the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over the Indian reservations. Is there anything sacred or savage in Indian reservations, so sacred or so savage in the character of Indian reservations that you hesitate to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal tribunals over them? I very much question, upon examining the statute to which the Senator from Iowa referred, if that is not the law today that it is extended over those reservations; so that the law to-day, that it is extended over those reservations; so that there is nothing insurrectionary in the first section of the bill.

What is the second? In brief, it simply is that you shall not steal from Indians. I said it yesterday; I say it to-day. Now, we have spent twenty-four hours in order to make an exception of a particular tribe, so that your law should say, "You shall not steal from Indians unless they are Sioux." Finally, the Senate has agreed not to make an exception of Indians, but it shall be just as unlawful to steal from Sioux.

to steal from Sioux as others.

Next, as to the third section; what is that, in the name of common sense? It proposes to say that if you go on to an Indian territory, and refuse to leave when you are told, you shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and you shall be fined and imprisoned; and I ask the Senate what are the two objections which have been urged to that section? The Senator from Indiana says the agent may be dishonest and refuse to give the notice. Well, I suggested, "Suppose we change that, and authorize the President to give the notice." O, says the Senator from Arkansas, he is too far off; he cannot give it quick enough. What are the mischiefs you are trying to avoid? What is the fact which called upon you to legislate in the direction of that third section? This fact, that to-day citizens go on to your Indian reservations and settle there, and although the Army can take them off, they laugh in the face of the Army, and say, the moment they are set down outside of the territory, "Good day, sir, I am going back;" and they go back. The Government is just so helpless as that. We propose this third section, to the effect that when they are taken off they may this third section, to the effect that when they are taken on they may be kept off, and we cannot pass the third section for two reasons. One is that the agent may not give the notice; and the other is that the President is so far off that he will not. We cannot get any legislation at all, because it will not work quick enough; and right upon the heels of that comes this proposition, to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Well, sir, if the Senate says so, I acquiesce, of course. Almost every Senator does acquiesce in what the Senate says. But I dealors in write of an averience here of say. the Senate says. But I declare, in spite of an experience here of several years, that it is a kind of legislative proceeding which staggers even me. There may be precedents for it, but I have not noticed them. I would rather the Senate should not do it. I would rather the Senate, without a great deal more hesitancy, would agree to say the few simple, honest things said in this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the very discussion which has taken place on this bill as to its construction and its effect on various Indian reservations is a sufficient argument, it seems to me, for its reference. Several Senators disagree as to what the effect of the third section is. The Senator from Indiana believes that as it now stands it will open the gate to the admission of anybody who chooses to go on the reservations. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Freling-HUYSEN] suggests that that is what I want. I say no. I will go as far as any one in protecting the reservations, except in the peculiar case which I have stated; but in the case of these vagabond paupers to whom we are paying a million and a half a year, and who still demand it or threaten war, I say I will, so far as my vote is concerned, go there and dig the gold out to pay them or they shall not have it; but I do not want to settle that question now. That is all.

Mr. KERNAN. Does my friend think it is quite an honest proposition, not to pay them until we go and steal it?

Mr. WINDOM. I say to my friend from New York that it is entirely honest. We do not owe them a cent. It is not under the treaty that we are asked to pay it. It will not be under a treaty that my friend will be called upon to vote a million and a half before this session closes for these Indians; but it will be simply, as I have said over and over again during the last three sessions, "pay or fight." They have no treaty to require it; but they say, contrary to their treaty, that they will make war upon us if we do not pay it; and I presume I shall have to come here and advocate it over again, if I have charge of the Indian bill, as I have done over and over again. It is no treaty obligation, and hence I say that, so far as that tribe is concerned of the nation of Sioux Indians, I would make an exception, and settle that question after full consideration.

Now, so far as this reference is concerned, it seems to me there are a great many things in this bill that demand the consideration of the Indian Committee. If it does not go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I certainly have several amendments yet to offer for discussion in the Senate; and one that I propose to offer is to strike out the proviso in the first section:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend the jurisdiction of said courts to offenses committed upon such reservation by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian.

At the proper time I shall give the reasons for moving that amendment. I believe that if the Judiciary Committee are to establish the Indian policy, if they are to settle questions relating wholly to Indian policy, and we are to ignore the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom that subject is generally intrusted, then in open Senate we should fully discuss the question of the Indian policy; and, for one, while I will interpose nothing for delay, I will take the liberty of making such motions and such suggestions in reference to the Indian policy as I think should be discussed in a full Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the remark made by the Senator from Minnesota that we had the alternative presented to us by the Sioux Indians of paying a million and a half or engaging in war with them, leads me to say that this is the first time I ever heard the suggestion that any such alternative was presented to us. As I remember the debates upon that appropriation, both Houses have always proceeded upon the selfish idea that it was better to provide for the substitute of these weeks by the second life. subsistence of these people by a gratuity, if you please to call it so, from the Treasury of the country than to engage in war with these people who, as it was anticipated, would be driven to the extremity of marauding and robbing the frontiers, because by the policy of this Government we had robbed the half-civilized Indians of their agricultural lands and driven the savage Indians from their fishing and thunting grounds into quarters where they had not the means, with the information they possessed, of obtaining a subsistence. That the information they possessed, of obtaining a subsistence. really is the truth.

This country is responsible for the Indian wars. This morning I have refreshed my recollection of a report made eight years ago, in which the Indians themselves were permitted to tell their own story, and in language so fraught with truth that there can be no misapprehension as to the accuracy of their statements in general. They spoke of the war in Minnesota, of which so much has been said, and they there assert, in language which if given in a court of justice would impress every hearer with its truthfulness, that it was due to the fact that we had not kept our stipulations with them.

Sir, I for one would like to have an Indian policy that was just, and see whether there be not lingering in these people that sentiment of justice common to mankind by which we could secure peace through justice and not through power without responsibility; and that is the policy that we have pursued, and the evils of the Indian wars have come from the same class of men who now, disregarding equally the rights of the Indians and the laws of their country, have gone over a boundary which they had no right to pass and have entered upon the possession of property which was not theirs, more than the property in this Capitol; and they might as a measure of justice as well have come here and driven us from our seats as to have gone into the Sioux country, which was pledged to these people by the solemn faith of this Government. Now let us for once enter on a policy of justice. Let us see whether we can punish people who violate the laws of the land; but here in the Senate we are asked to excuse from the technical operation of the laws of the land men who, admitted violators, are so powerful that the law cannot reach them. That is the reason urged here for excepting a portion of the Sioux reservation from the exclusive rights of the Sioux Indians. If the reason for doing that was that the Sioux themselves had violated the treaty and we were no longer bound by it, why was not the proposi-tion made to open the whole of the Sioux country to the people of the United States? If the treaty was violated, it was violated in whole and not in part; and if by reason of the violation of that treaty we could enter without new stipulations upon a portion of the territory reserved to those people, we might as well have entered upon the whole; but it was only where the gold was found that we thought it necessary to exempt the land from the operations of the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

tion? I ask the Senator if he does not know that it is a fact that there are to-day a great many citizens of the United States, white persons, residing on Indian reservations who went there in pursuance of the settled policy of the United States which authorized citizens to go on unsurveyed lands of this Government? I say there are cases where men went there before the reservations were established; and subsequent to the time that they went there reservations have been established and no provision has been made whatever for their removal, and they are there now on the reservations. Then again I ask whether the provisions of this second section would not make every one of the white settlers on these lands criminals whenever they cut a stick of wood or a pound of grass?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know any such facts as constitute the premises of the inquiry.

Mr. MITCHELL know there are a know the tory, a reservation containing to-day about two million acres of land included in an Indian reservation created by a treaty made after numerous citizens of the United States had settled on those lands, and no provision has been made, as I am informed, for the removal of those citizens. They are there to-day upon their farms with their imthose citizens. They are there to-day upon their farms with their improvements. They cannot get away. But pass this bill and you virtually say, you in fact say by the legislative power of Congress that they, if they cut a stick of timber for fire-wood or a pound of grass, are criminals in the eyes of the law. And yet Senators will stand here and wonder why any of us should oppose the passage of this here and wonder why any of us should oppose the passage of this bill, and will tell us that this is a bill to prevent stealing, as the hon-orable Senator from Wisconsin says. But as the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota has failed, he says that now it is a bill to pre-vent stealing from Indians except from the Sioux. I think there is more than that about this bill. I think there are a great many things about this bill that have not been properly considered by the Judi-ciary Committee. I know of several reservations within my own knowledge, reservations that I have been on personally and know whereof I speak, where settlers, in pursuance as I say of the policy of whereof I speak, where settlers, in pursuance as I say of the policy of the United States which recognized settlement upon unsurveyed lands, have gone and afterward the Government has come in and negotiated a treaty with Indians and they are now on an Indian reservation scattering all over their claims, and no provision whatever has been made for these settlers in any way. They are there; you may say they are there wrongfully just as you may say these people are in the Black Hills wrongfully; but they are there as a matter of fact, and you have got to deal with the case just as it is now. Why not make some provision for their removal? Why not provide in some way, by some kind of exception in this bill, something that will enable these persons to get away? That is one point that I should like to have considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. It is precisely such cases as have been referred to by the Senator from Oregon that I think require the attention of the Indian Committee. This second section makes a sweeping provision as to every reservation in the country, without any knowledge, so far as the Senate is concerned, as to the specific character of the treaty or the provisions of the specific treaties; without any knowledge of ated a treaty with Indians and they are now on an Indian reservation or the provisions of the specific treaties; without any knowledge of the condition of affairs on these various reservations. It seems to me that a law so sweeping as this should be more fully considered by the proper committee.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts fires up with a great deal of righteous indignation against the treatment of these peaceful, kind-hearted, humane, red brothers in the West, and he says that he has some Indian speeches before him which he thinks would curdle the blood, (I do not know that he used that expression,) but would thrill the Senate if he were permitted to read them, telling their grievances, and among the rest their grievances in Minnesota in 1862. Sir, having lived on the border for the last twenty years, I think I have about as much knowledge of these excellent red men as my honorable friend who lives on the shores of the Atlantic, in Massa-chusetts. Those of us here who are well acquainted with the mild, with the gentle, and with the humane individuals to whom he refers with such encomiums, know that if there are liars or vagabonds on the face of this green earth who can compete with the Indians they have not yet been discovered. He referred to what occurred in Minnesota, and said that that terrible massacre was brought on by the illtreatment of these Sioux Indians by the Government

Mr. CONKLING. He did not say that; he said the Indians said so. Mr. WINDOM. The Indians said so. I will refer to the facts and show him what liars the Indians are, and how mild and how very I only wish my friend, who loves them so well and gentle they are. who warms up with such generous philanthropy whenever he speaks of their wrongs, could have these neighbors imported down in the boot in Massachusetts, to remain there a few years, that he might know them better than he does now.

Sir, what was the offense that the Government was guilty of which created that outbreak in Minnesota in 1862? Congress had been a little tardy in making an appropriation, and the money was on its way to make the payments under the treaty when the outbreak comway to make the payments under the treaty when the outbreak commenced. The Indians, being ready from various causes, but chiefly that of the incarnate devil in their own nature, made an excuse because the payments had not been received on time, to make that outbreak. What was the result? I tell you, sir, if it had not been for the great war which was then raging, and which filled the minds of the people of this country so that they could not notice anything also even the humane Senator from Messachusetts would be a fell even the humane Senator from Massachusetts would have felt his blood tingle at outrages on white men as well as outrages on red men. Why, sir, eight hundred people in Minnesota along the border were murdered in cold blood; infants were nailed against the walls of houses by their hands and feet, while those savages stood up and threw tomahawks at them in the presence of their own mothers. Infants were cut to pieces and laid upon their mothers' bosoms, who were tied down upon the ground and could not move, and were compelled to lay there and die with the pieces of the dead infants lying upon them.

These are the humane and gentle savages that have been so fearfully outraged, and these are the same men that we are so anxious to provide for now in the Sioux reservation. They were driven from the provide for now in the Sioux reservation. They were driven from the State of Minnesota. They took refuge, after the Army drove them out, on the western plains, and they are the same Indians precisely that we have been discussing for the last twenty-four hours. I know that they are savages; I know that we must make some allowance for this, and I have, as I have said twice before since this discussion has been before the Senate, during nearly my entire service in Congress labored to do them justice. I will do them justice to-day. I believe that, with all the Senator's humanity, with all his philanthropy, I have said ten words in favor of paying the Indians, in favor of keeping our treaty stipulation with them, in favor of preventing their starvation, to one word which he ever uttered practically to benefit them on this floor or on the other. I will do it to-day. I am willing to vote yet to foor or on the other. I will do it to-day. I am willing to vote yet to keep these men from starving. I will do it whenever the bill comes up. I expect to urge it here. I shall do it again, however, upon the same ground that I have done it before. The Senator is mistaken in saying that we have not voted these appropriations to prevent war. Senator here present, I apprehend, knows it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I admit, as my friend goes on, a great many slight inaccuracies; but the observation to which he is now calling the attention of the Senate as given by him does not report the facts as they appear to me. The statement to which I objected was subas they appear to me. The statement to which I objected was substantially this: that we had year after year voted a million and a half to the Sioux because they threatened us with a war if we did not do it. I said we voted it as a gratuity, because we thought it better policy. I gave as a reason for that thought in the minds of some the reflection that we had robbed the half-civilized Indians of their agricultural lands and the savages of their fishing and hunting grounds.

Mr. WINDOM. That may have been the motive of some I doubt.

Mr. WINDOM. That may have been the motive of some, I doubt

Mr. BOUTWELL. I refer now particularly to the fact that as far as I know it is the first time to-day when the statement has been made in the Senate that we were offered the alternative of voting a million and a half to the Sioux or accepting their threat that they would make and a nail to the Sloux or accepting their threat that they would make war upon us if we did not do it.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no doubt that the motive which actuated my honorable friend from Massachusetts when he voted these appropriations, was that of pure philanthropy. I have no question about it from his speech to-day. But, as I have said before, having had charge of the Indian appropriation bill for the last five years, I know that I have myself said, in urging it over and over again, that it was a mere question whether it is not cheaper to feed than to fight Indians; and every Senator knows that that expression has been worn dians; and every Senator knows that that expression has been worn threadbare here in discussing those questions, "that it is cheaper to feed than to fight." It is the argument which has been used nere, in the other end of the Capitol, and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to induce us to vote these large appropriations.

It has been then, I say, held out here as the alternative of peace or war; and to show that it has been the alternative of peace or war, let me call your attention to a single fact. A little above this reservation, on the Missouri River, at Fort Berthold, there were a large number of Indians who were peaceful, always had been friendly, never had threatened war, had united with us in punishing the hostile Sioux, could always be relied upon as scouts for our Army. We appropriated to those men $80,000, while we appropriated the sum I have stated to these warlike savages, who threatened us and would not keep the peace, as we believed, if they were not paid $1,200,000. The exact proportion of numbers I do not remember, but I think I am safe in saying that we appropriated five dollars to these warlike Indians as the alternative of peace or war where we appropriated one dollar to the peaceful Indians who lived alongside of them, and who needed our generosity and our philanthropy quite as much as they did. I called the attention of the Senate to that matter at the last session, and I urged that the starving condition of these peaceful Indians, these friends of ours, demanded our sympathy and our aid; but I did not succeed in adding a dollar to the appropriation. But when, on the other hand, we told you it was "feed or fight," you marched up to the rack and voted $1,200,000, because you did not want to fight. At the same time we had a treaty with those Indians, by which they promised faithfully to keep the peace. We have done that for the promised faithfully to keep the peace. last three years

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I did not expect to participate in this debate when I made a suggestion in regard to the third section; but it seems to me on examining it closely that it is so monstrous that it ought not to pass unnoticed. Here is a bill the ostensible purpose of which is to protect the Indian country from invasion by making trespassers liable to indictment by a grand jury in the courts of the United States. That is all very fair. Then here comes a third section, providing that such indictment or such liability to the punishment shall viding that such indictment or such liability to the punishment shall depend upon having a warning given by an Indian agent, an irresponsible Indian agent, upon a salary of $1,200 or $1,500 a year. He is made the autocrat of the Indian country; he can admit whom he pleases, he can reject whom he pleases. He is made the absolute judge from whom there is no appeal as to who ought to be admitted and who ought not. That is the effect of that section precisely. It seems to me that while this bill was drafted in good faith, it is simply a sham, and the worst kind of a sham. It leaves the whole matter in the hands of the Indian agent. I have just been informed that there are two Indian agents in the Sioux reservation. That reservation, I believe, is as large as several States.

Mr. ALLISON. There are six Indian agents on the reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. There are six Indian agents on the reservation.

Mr. MORTON. I was told by the Senator from Kansas two. Mr. ALLISON. Six having charge of the Sioux Indians. reservation embraces an area of 70,000 square miles.

Mr. MORTON. Seventy thousand square miles and six Indian Mr. MORTON. Seventy thousand square miles and six Indian agents, taking the largest number, are made the absolute judges as to who may go on to it and who may not, and if they should not be incorruptible men—and perhaps some of them may not be; I do not know; I presume they are honest men—they might admit their friends to dig gold and turn everybody else out. They may overlook their friends; they may not see them; they do not give them warning; but those who will not pay tribute are warned to leave, and, by the way, nobody can warn a trespasser off but the Indian agent. *This Sioux reservation is in General Sheridar's department. reservation is in General Sheridan's department. The general himself may be there at the head of the Fifth Cavalry, now out there; he may see these gold-hunters; but he has no power to warn them off. It is the Indian agent alone to whom that great responsibility is trusted. The General of the Army or the Lieutenant-General of the Army, any officer of the regular Army, with instructions to enforce the law can-not give this notice, and nobody but an Indian agent can do it.

If it was designed to open the widest door to corruption and make the whole thing a sham and a fraud, it could not be better done than it is by that section. It was not the purpose. It was drafted in good faith, I know, but the effect of it is to make it a mere license for an Indian agent to do whatever he pleases, admit whom he pleases, turn out whom he pleases, and make him the absolute governor of the whole

Indian country.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I think very clearly this bill should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, because it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Anairs, because it affects the Indian policy, and there is already referred to that committee a memorial from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, requesting such legislation as will lead to the early opening of the Black Hills to the settlement of emigrants. That memorial is already in the possession of that committee. The question whether or not we shall now so change the law as to make that a criminal offerse which before was a mere trespass certainly goes to criminal offense which before was a mere trespass certainly goes to that question.

The first section of this bill, it seems to me from the remarks made by the Senator from Iowa, does no more than re-enact what is already the law. There is sufficient law now to protect any person on that reservation against any criminal offense. The other two sections of the bill only create new offenses, making that criminal which now is not criminal. There are persons going into that territory we know. It is a matter of public notoriety that immense numbers of people are going there, are there now, that a village has sprung up there, houses are being erected, and saw-mills are being erected, and communities are springing up in that country. Now, whether we shall pass a law here which shall make these people criminals is a matter, I think, which deserves very serious consideration; and if the Committee on Indian Affairs shall see proper to report to us a policy which will settle the whole question, it will avoid altogether the necessity for the passage of this bill.

So far as the intention of paragraphs going there is absented the latter.

So far as the intention of persons going there is charged to be with the purpose of stealing from the Indians, I think there is no ground whatever for such a charge. It is well known that the only purpose of the persons who go there is for settlement, and to procure gold, which is reported to exist there in large quantities. That does not belong to the Indians; the Indians have no right to it; the people who go there are not going to deprive the Indians of any of their property. The only light in which it can be regarded is that by permitting these persons to go there we are interfering with the possession of the Indians upon this reservation, because it is a mere possession which they have. The title to this country is in the Government of the United States. That is where it rests; and, so far as the Indians are concerned, we are only to protect them by our treaty obligations in their possession; and, so far as stealing from them is concerned, there is no ground whatever for such a charge, either in law or in fact, as it seems to me.

I think this matter should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that we should have their views upon the whole subject, particularly as the question comes before us at the request of at least one State, and perhaps others

State, and perhaps others.

Mr. HOWE. One more word, Mr. President, and I hope it is the last. I want to say to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. McMillan] that he is mistaken about the character of this bill. It does not affect the Indian policy. It affects the policy of the whites. It simply raises the question whether marauding is the regular policy of the white people. That is all.

The Senator from Oregon who is not in his seat [Mr. MITCHELL] reminded us of a distressing case in the Territory of Wyoming, where some white people had gone on to the Shoshone reservation, and he complains that this bill does not make any provision for removing those people from that reservation. The Senator is mistaken. This bill makes ample provision for removing them. Passthis bill and they will remove, and they never will remove until you do pass some bill of this kind.

Sir, the Senate is on trial, I say again, more than anybody else. If you owe any obligation in the world to anybody, you owe it just as much to the savages, whom you have taken under your guardianship and with whom you have made contracts and treaties time and again, as to anybody else. If you will not keep faith with them, tell me with whom you will keep faith. You have said they shall have certain territory for their exclusive occupation. You have said that it shall be unlawful to enter on that territory. You know that people do enter on these territories. We ask you now for a law which will punish, not the mere entry on the territories, but the refusal to leave; and two parties arise in the Senate to oppose that bill. One of them says it is monstrous, in the language of the Senator from Indiana. Monstrous, why? Because it does not operate quick enough; it may not get them off soon enough. The Indian agent or the President may shirk hts duty. The other side says, in effect, it is monstrous because it tends to get them off at all.

cause it tends to get them off at all.

Without any more words of mine, I would like to take a census of the Senate and see whether these two parties together outnumber those in the Senate who say that, after all, trespassers ought to quit and should be punished if they do not quit when the Government of the United States tells them to do so.

Mr. WINDOM. Is there any difficulty whatever in rendering this results of the Senate of the senate are purious where havings it is

Mr. WINDOM. Is there any difficulty whatever in rendering this verdict of the Senate after a second committee, whose business it is to understand this question, has considered it? The Senator seems to put the question as if this was a final settlement. I only ask now that the Committee on Indian Affairs, whose province has been invaded by this other reference, that the Committee on Indian Affairs, who know more of this question than any other committee, shall consider it, and, when they have considered it, I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall be put upon trial again, as my friend from Wisconsin says. I am perfectly willing, after we have given it full consideration, when the proper committee has reported with reference to the condition of these reservations and the effect of this bill, that this moral question shall be tried and settled here; and I think that those of us who seek further investigations are entitled to quite as much consideration as those gentlemen who seek to force this bill through with all its known defects, and especially after it has been so clearly pointed out by the Senator from Indiana, who takes an opposite view from what I do, that this bill is simply a farce so far as the third section is concerned, that it is simply "a pretense and a sham," to use his own language. I do not want to be tried morally on a vote that is a mere sham and pronounced so by a leading and honorable Senator of this body. Let us investigate it further and the have our trial, and we can plead "guilty" or "not guilty."

we can plead "guilty" or "not guilty."

Mr. EATON. Mr. Fresident, I hope the motion will prevail. I hope this bill, which seems to be a very faulty one, will be committed to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and let us have thorough legislation on this subject. I certainly, as one Senator, desire to do full justice to the Indians; and I desire also to do full justice to the borderer and his family. I am quite well aware of the fact that all our sympathies ought not to be expended upon the red man; they ought to be given a little to our own calor.

our sympathies ought not to be expended upon the red man; they ought to be given a little to our own color.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say that in my judgment the bill should be committed to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That committee is supposed to know something in regard to Indian affairs, something in regard to the Indian character. The difference in the judgment of those living in the Northwest and those living in the East in regard to Indian character is very marked. I fully agree with the Senator from Minnesota as to the conduct of the Indian toward the border people. I represent a State with hundreds of miles of Indian frontier, and I know that our women and children are carried into captivity, that men are murdered, that frontiersmen have to plow their fields with their rifle by their side; and knowing what I do know, I am well aware that the famous characters of Leatherstocking and Minnehaha as painted by the novelist and the poet are creations of fancy. He who knows the Indian well as I know him in his wild state knows that there are no such characters there.

Let this bill go to the committee whose duty it is to understand and appreciate the Indian character by having received testimony disclosing what that character is. So far as I am concerned, I want to do justice by the Indian, and I want to do justice by my own race. I do not want Indians who are placed on reservations, as they are in my State, to be allowed to receive permits from those in charge to go out apparently on hunting excursions, taking their ponies and their rifles with them, and come back with the scalps of Texans or frontiersmen. I want to see that thing broken up. I want to see peace and quiet on the frontier.

That character of integrity attributed to those mythical Indians to whom I have referred is beautiful on paper, and the control of the Indian by moral suasion is remarkably nice to read of in books; but there is but one course to control the Indians, and that is by a manifestation of physical power coupled with a disposition and will to execute that power in case they refuse to comply. I differ a little with the Senator from Minnesota in regard to what is humanity to the Indians. It is said that it is better to feed them than to fight them. When an Indian violates his duty, comes over to the settlements, murders women and children or carries them into captivity and commits crimes that are not to be named here, it is better to fight him to extermination than to permit your own friends thus to suffer.

him to extermination than to permit your own friends thus to suffer.

I desire this bill to be committed to the Indian Committee, because I believe that committee is better qualified to decide what sort of bill to make, not only in this case, but in other cases which may arise in connection with our intercourse with the Indians

in connection with our intercourse with the Indians.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, I have an opinion that the Senate will be disappointed if it is expected that the Indian Committee within any very reasonable length of time is going to be prepared to bring this bill back again, or any other bill in the place of it, settling forever the Indian policy. The Committee on Indian Affairs knows something about Indian matters, as it is supposed every Senator on this floor does; but its members perhaps do know but little, if any, better than this body what is to be a final and settled policy with reference to all the Indian tribes in the country.

with reference to all the Indian tribes in the country.

The people of the Eastern States got rid of their Indians a long time ago, before the chairman of the Indian Committee was born or the honorable gentleman presiding over the Judiciary Committee who brings in this bill here with its amendments. As I say, a long time ago the Indians of the Eastern States east of the great range of Alleghany Mountains—and there used to be, according to Bancroft, about 150,000 of them on the Atlantic slope—were got rid of. Somehow or other, by some policy or other, our neighbors of the Eastern States—I wish I had the mastery of that policy they invented—got rid of all the Indians; shoved them over the tops of the mountains, along the streams and the margin of the lakes and around the ponds, over to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and our other sister-States of the great West.

Imitating as nearly as we could that unwritten policy of our eastern neighbors, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in time, by an unwritten policy also, got rid of the red man. We have shoved him over on to Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and the great unexplored region of the United States. Now Nebraska is just as anxious to get rid of them as Massachusetts was. Kansas is behaving not one bit better. Everybody wants to get rid of them, and everybody wants a policy about them. You cannot get rid of them any more than you can get rid of disease. They are a malarial portion of our country. They are with us and of us, and in my humble opinion they have come to stay. Now you are going to put it off on to this Indian Committee, are you, to unravel this intoxicating question? [Laughter.] The policy has been to shove them west. Oregon, California, and the young silvershining State of Nevada have raised their flags of protestation, and propose that they shall go east a while. They have had enough of them. So they are now between us out there in the great territorial bosom of the Republic, and a very considerable trouble they are to us.

bosom of the Republic, and a very considerable trouble they are to us. I have got a very short policy about them. For my part, I propose in time to make every living one of them, men and women; pappooses and squaws, chiefs; heroes, and medicine-men, citizens of the United States. That is what I propose. I do not know anybody in this land white enough, or black enough, or red enough not to be an American citizen; and, as we have extended that great boon to the colored race and have elevated them upon the high platform of equality with us where they justly are and shall remain, so also I propose to extend the same policy to the red man of the Territories, to offer them this priceless boon upon easy and reasonable conditions.

How shall we make it practicable? He must first be civilized? Mr. President, read the treaty made with these wild roving bands of Sioux Indians. Read the provisions inserted in that treaty by the Indians themselves. Undertake to make a treaty to-day with the wildest band of Indians under our control, and you will find them wildest band of Indians under our control, and you will find them abundantly able to cope with you or me or any of us in guarding their rights under judicious provisions. They understand property rights; they understand personal rights; they understand personal liberty; they understand government; and already, so far as I am concerned, the whole pack of them are sufficiently advanced for me and my purposes to offer them American citizenship. I will take the risk of the barbarian blood that is in them; I will take the risk of their unfortunate and deplorable condition; and, like my colleague from Illinois, with whom I heartily agree, and am truly glad that he agrees with the Committee on Indian Affairs, so far as I know their sentiment, certainly with me, am opposed to turning them over to the War Department. I propose that the Christian churches of this nation, in their humane efforts to better the condition of these children of the their humane efforts to better the condition of these children of the forest, shall go on uninterrupted, shall take them into their charge, and keep them, where they work gratuitously, humanely, persistently, until to-day we see the visible marks of religious and Christianizing influences upon more than fifty tribes, yea more than one hundred tribes of Indians.

I think, if I may be permitted to speak for one moment on that point, and commit myself to it now as I do, that it will be a mistake to take them out from under their present influences, the present favors extended them gratuitously by the liberal and religiously disposed people of the United States, and place them under the guardianship and protection of the War Department. We know that the Army is a highly honorable, worthy, and serviceable branch of the Government. We know what veneration we have for its history, and Government. We know what veneration we have for its history, and what respect we have for its character. It is composed of upright and honest men. But in my opinion it is not the instrument to be used in the civilization of these tribes of Indians. So I shall regretfully look upon any bill which may pass the two Houses of Congress to transfer the management of Indian affairs from where it now is to that Department of the Government.

Here are the Sioux. I think the Senator from Kansas perhaps is right. He may know them better than I do now, though once I had the pleasure of going upon their ground; once I lived with them; once I roamed over their country for a limited time; traveled with them; camped with them on the way from the turbid Missouri to what was then the clear and silver-shining Sacramento. I wandered over them; camped with them on the way from the turbid missouri to what was then the clear and silver-shining Sacramento. I wandered over the Indian country, mingled with them, and studied their character for some time; and, strange as it may seem, the better I knew them, the better I liked them.

The Indian has a heart; the Indian has a manhood; he is the na-The Indian has a heart; the Indian has a manhood; he is the native owner of the soil; like you and me he was created in the image of God. I will not trample upon him; I will not exterminate him; I will not drive him through desperation to ruin; I will for one extend to him the American hand of civilization; I will extend to him the high privileges of American citizenship. That is the solution; that is the policy; that is the way if must end, or it will end in ruin and heartless extirpation. I will not dip my fingers in that blood, Mr. President. They ought to become citizens. They have a right to become citizens. Wild and intractable as many of them are today, they have a right to live in this Republic and mont these fair to become citizens. Wild and intractable as many of them are to-day, they have a right to live in this Republic and upon these fair day, they have a right to live in this Republic and upon these fair lands, descended to them through countless centuries; descended to them from an antiquity we have not yet unveiled, based far as we know upon an occupancy reaching back beyond the dawn of civilization.

It is said that this Sioux tribe are troublesome, very troublesome. They are in our way. Mr. President, the great General of the Army, who was one of the delegation to make that treaty, and the other gentlemen with him did not happen to provide that mineral lands should be excepted from the provisions of the treaty. We took all the territory they laid claim to, passed them into the boundaries defined in the treaty, and gave them the whole concern so far as occupancy went. Recently gold deposits have been discovered by them, or rather we have discovered it for them, but I have no doubt in the world they have known discovered it for them, but I have no doubtin the world they have known of it for years and years. I suppose they knew about it before gold was discovered in California. It is valuable; it is on their reservation. Now they say we shall not have it unless we pay for it. We have given it to them. Here we are with our hands tied; there they are with their bands with the content of hands untied. They say we shall not have it unless we pay an exorbitant price. The chairman of our committee indicates to-day, and I think he is not far from the mark, that probably the future will develop there is but little of mineral wealth there, little compared to our present expectations; but there is a quantity of it there and they will not under present circumstances let us have it.

Our roving, intelligent, practical, incisive American spirits, whether hunting for gold, or fortune, or fame, or renown, or anything else attainable within the reach of human energy, are going there on their own hook, and hooking when they do. You want this Indian Committee to settle that matter, do you? The Judiciary Committee has tried and somewhat failed, the impression is. Do you want us fellows to unravel this trouble? There is right upon one side and a wrong upon the other. The Indians have the country by treaty, by occupaupon the other. The Indians have the country by treaty, by occupation, by visible, enduring ownership. The fee is ultimately in the nation, but they have the occupancy which gives them a present fee. They have got the gold, but do not want it, and we do want it. The trouble now is to get that gold out of those hills, and in violation of treaty to get in there without the consent of the Indians, and explore that mineral region until we find the last bottom dollar there is in it, and then, most likely, turn the land over to the Indians again. There that mineral region until we find the last bottom dollar there is in it, and then, most likely, turn the land over to the Indians again. There they stand upon their rights, demanding, if I remember, Mr. President, [to Mr. Allison,] about seventy millions from you, did they not? And you were wholly unprepared to meet the draft. [Laughter.] Seventy millions is manifestly too much. I should say that ten millions was too much; five, or perhaps three, millions would be too much. Just how much would be a fair equivalent, a quid pro quo, as the lawyers say when they speak upon that subject, I do not know. But, Mr. President, if we are going to do the fair thing about this matter, and save trouble, we shall have to try to make another treaty with them; we shall have to try it again. This body, I regret to say, all potent, all honorable as it is, yea this whole American people, will not be able to keep, as we call it, emigration out of the Black Hills. I do not see, to be perfectly frank, how it can be done. I am perfectly willing, in regard to the Black Hills, as I was willing in regard to California and Oregon and Nevada, that the mineral wealth hidden in the earth should be brought to its surface, and distributed over the world without tax or hinderance. That is a wise and just policy. I would be glad to-day if the people could go with unobstructed freedom to the Black Hills and take the mineral out there and put it in circulation, without a dollar of tax or a day of hinderance. and put it in circulation, without a dollar of tax or a day of hinderance. I should be glad to see it done, but I am confronted with this treaty.

But then we are not going to have any war with them. Mr. President, I was listening to the Senator from Maine yesterday deploring dent, I was listening to the Senator from Maine yesterday deploring the possibility of an approaching war, and so I thought I would look back to this treaty and see if it had not been fenced against. He has utterly forgotten the treaty, as all these gentlemen here have. There were warriors on both sides when this treaty, was made, great warriors. Sitting Bull was there and the Man-afraid-of-his-horses, and several of them who were not afraid of their horses. [Laughter.] We had several distinguished gentlemen on our side of the question. One among the number was the illustrious General of the Army, and I know there is not going to be any more war with the Sioux, bad as they are, for the very first article says, the very first line of the as they are, for the very first article says, the very first line of the first article says:

From this day forward all war between the parties to this agreement shall forever

Why do Senators so far forget themselves as to suppose we are going to have a war, under any aggravating circumstances, with the Sioux? Gentlemen, the treaty prohibits it. [Laughter.] Absolutely the same treaty that prevents these fellows from going into the Black Hills to get the gold prohibits a war; and one provision, I doubt not, will be a faithfully stoad by and accounted as the action. Hills to get the gold prohibits a war; and one provision, I doubt not, will be as faithfully stood by and executed as the other. [Laughter.] I have not the least doubt about it. I doubt if we shall know what to do with this bill if you send it to our Committee on Indian Affairs. Is the Indian policy to be settled now, when the habits of those people and our own have been so various? A period of two hundred and fifty years mingling together on this great continent has been wholly insufficient as to time to solve this question, and can any bill we may bring in here rid it of its difficulties, penalties or no penalties? Who will execute the penalties that the Senator from Indiana characterizes as a sham? Suppose the Senator from Indiana proposes something that will not be a sham, or suppose somebody else will, that can be executed. Why blink these facts? Who will be your jurors and the court to preside in those territories but the white occupants of the territories themselves? Where was the jury to come from upon one occasion to try selves? Where was the jury to come from upon one occasion to try the greatest criminal the Republic ever saw, as some of us thought? Pass any law you will, it must be executed by the people who are upon the ground. You may make your penalties strong or weak, fix what penalties you choose, we shall have to trust the judiciary for carrying the law into execution under the circumstances that will surround the case. I know where the jury will come from; I know where the witnesses will come from; and, painful as the reflection may be, painful as the concession is, that it is sometimes difficult to execute law in our own midst, it will be infinitely more so to execute it under such circumstances.

The treaty troubles me, Mr. President. The treaty is in my way.
I was as much outraged as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs was last summer in his commendable efforts to settle this difficulty when he failed, or rather when the commission failed, to bring those Indians to reasonable terms. All the American people were disgusted because these Indians would not treat with us; but they are our equals. We have made them our equals by the treaty. There they stand upon their rights. Shall we go and horn them off Is there not ingenuity enough in the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on the Judiciary, or all the committees of this honorable body, to contribute a scheme by which you can get possession of that region now held by these Indians without their consent?

If an Indian policy is expected to be reported back from the Indian Committee at any time during this session or during this Congress, I know of nothing more acceptable for that committee than an open expression of sentiment by this honorable body now. We have the Indian Territory down here with which to open the ball. Under the treaty made with the Five Nations at the close of the civil war, all west of the ninety-seventh meridian was thrown open for occupancy by the tribes of the plains, and we should be very glad indeed to have them go there, glad to persuade them to go there. Some thirty tribes or a portion of tribes have already gone there. Here is a great Sioux region of seventy thousand square miles, just as there are about fifty thousand square miles in the Indian Territory, in which another Indian territory is to be builded up, and it is right in the way of the onward march of this great thrifty American people to the Pacific coast. Already the Senator from Nebraska advertises us this morning that the Indian reservations in his own State are in the way of ing that the Indian reservations in his own State are in the way of the free locomotion of the citizens of that State. Wherever you go you will stumble over an Indian reservation. There are multitudes of them all over these Territories—any quantity of Indian reservaof them an over these refrictnes—any quantity of indian reserva-tions. You cannot go anywhere that you will not possibly strike the borders or the confines of some one of them. Are they to remain so? Are they to be dotted here and there in little red spots all over the plains? Is that an Indian policy? Yes, it was fixed in 1868. It was fixed by act of Congress and solemn ratification of Indian treaties that that was to be the policy. That was the policy then. Now another one it is suggested must be inaugurated.

There is but one policy, Mr. President; it will end in that: Either the extermination of that unfortunate race, or their elevation to American citizenship. In the presence of my country to-day, I am myself on the side of extending to them the hand of cordial greeting and of elevating them to the high plane of citizenship. let some gentleman more familiar with this question than myself say that I am dealing in fancy, that I am dealing in poetry. Do not har-row up my feelings, as the Senator from Minnesota a few moments ago did, with one of those tales that made the hair stand on end, and every hair melancholy. Do not restate those old things of the past. Let us have reconciliation. Let us forget the past. Let us bury the past with the tomahawk; let us extend the warm hand of greeting to past with the tomahawk; let us extend the warm hand of greeting to our ancient and venerable enemy of the plains, and ask him if he will not come in, ratify all the constitutional amendments, and stand up with us in the onward march to that glorious fructification in which every man shall be a potentate and nobody shall be a subject.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I only rise to express the hope that the Senate will now vote on my motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I think that the speech of the honorable Senator from Illinois has convinced us that it will be in the hands of its friends. He stands second on the Committee on Indian Affairs. He says that that committee will all understand how to treat this question. Now, Mr. President, if an honorable Senator who has travquestion. Now, Mr. President, if an honorable Senator who has traveled from the muddy Missouri to the silvery Sacramento of the Indians, who has eaten with them, who has mingled with them by day and by night, and the more he knows them the better he loves them, if he is not the Senator to devise an Indian policy, then, in the name of conscience, who is? I therefore hope that the Senate will be ready now to accept the proposition which I have made and place this whole subject in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, I am , will refer it to my honorable friend from Illinois.

With reference to making the Indians citizens, we have had a little experience in Minnesota. I would like to compete with my friend in friendship for the Indian, if I could; but I think he has gone a little further than I can go. We tried making the half-blood Indians citizens some years ago, or at least in the territorial times they were voters; and I remember an instance in which one old coat answered for sixteen votes, and was not much of an old coat when they got through. That has been our experience substantially of making these men voters.

But there is another reason why, without any joking, I wish this bill to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am earnestly in favor of the amendment which I suggested a few moments since, namely, to strike out the proviso to the second section and extend the law to Indians as well as to white men. I am certain that my honorable friend who proposes to leave the Indian upon the high plateau, as he says, of citizenship will be ready to extend the criminal laws of the country to the Indians on the reservations as well as to the white men. I want the bill to go to that committee for that amendment. I hope we may have a vote on the reference.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on the

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS. No; let us have the yeas

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the call cannot be withdrawn unless by consent of the Senate. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. HOWE. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL.] He, if present, would vote for the reference; I should vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 41, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—41.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the resolu-tions of the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of Mr. Starkweather the business of the Senate be suspended, that the friends of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. President, the Angel of Death in passing has again thrust his hand into our midst and taken from our number another member of the Forty-fourth Congress.

HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, a member of the House of Representatives from the third congressional district in Connecticut, died in this city on the morning of the 28th ultimo.

By this sudden dispensation of Providence the State of Connecticut has lost one of her most honored citizens and faithful public servants, has lost one of her most honored citizens and faithful public servants, on whose wisdom, experience, integrity, and patriotism her people have been 'accustomed to rely, and whose death we mourn to-day and join in paying tribute of respect to his memory.

Born of Christian parents, whose piety was of that decided type which prevailed in New England in the last generation, he was early taught to fear and reverence God and love his fellow-man. Guided by the prayers and counsels of his parents his life developed into that devoted and useful Christian character which so much endeared him to all of his friends and fallow-citizens. to all of his friends and fellow-citizens.

Mr. Starkweather was born in the town of Preston, Connecticut, on the 29th day of April, 1826. His early years were spent in laboring on his father's farm in that town, and improving his early eduing on his father's farm in that town, and improving his early educational advantages in the public schools, which are open, free, to every child in that State. Endowed with fine natural abilities and with a full determination on his part to improve to the best advantage the talents which God had given him, he employed the time during his minority by cultivating the soil and teaching in the public schools, and by diligent reading and study he acquired that mental culture that enabled him to enter upon the study of his chosen profession. In the year 1846 he made the city of Norwich his future place of residence, and entered upon the study of the law under the guidance of the Hon. Lafayette S. Foster, and was admitted to practice in 1850. For several years he retained a large and remunerative practice and occupied a high position among his professional associates of the bar. He was elected a member of the house of representatives in the Legislature of Connecticut in 1856, and distinguished himself in a capable and faithful legislation; was a delegate to the National Republican Convention of 1860, which nominated Mr. Lincoln, and in 1868, which nominated General Grant, for President. He was appointed in 1861 postmaster at Norwich, and re-appointed in 1865, which office he resigned in 1866, as he said in a letter at the time, "that a soldier who had fought and bled for his country might receive the honor and endowments of the office." He was elected to the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-third, and Forty-fourth Congresses as a republican. Congresses as a republican.

Congresses as a republican.

Mr. STARKWEATHER early exhibited a taste for political life. Three of his paternal uncles had been prominent lawyers, and two of them, Hon. David A. Starkweather, of Ohio, and Hon. George C. Starkweather, of New York, had been members of Congress, which fact undoubtedly stimulated him to struggle for political honors. By his capacity and assiduous attention to all the duties which had been intrusted to him as a Representative in the councils of the nation he won the confidence and respect of his constituents, and, as an evidence of their high sense of appreciation of his services as a legislator, he was elected to represent his district in Congress for five consecutive terms, and died in the service.

As a member of the House of Representatives, Mr. STARKWEATHER had the confidence and respect not only of his constituents and friends at home, but of his fellow-members in that body, all of whom honored him for his simplicity and Christian virtues, and all who knew him testify to his untiring industry and diligent attention to all of his official duties,

Mr. Starkweather was a modest man, not brilliant in speech, participating in debate but seldom. He possessed a clear, strong mind and sound judgment, which enabled him to readily comprehend all matters of business before the House and see it in its proper light. When his mind was once made up, it was not easy to swerve him from his purpose. By his quiet manner, by personal solicitation, by urging measures at the right time, he was very successful in making himself felt, and often achieved greater results than a more demonstrative orator could have done. In a word, it may be said: He was faithful. He was capable. He was honest.

Alas! he has gone. His voice will no more be heard in these Halls forever. With him the voyage of life is ended. He has reached that haven at last where the winds cease to blow, the waters are still, and where there is eternal rest.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I was the associate and friend of Mr. Starkweather during all the time of his service in the House, and I therefore deem it my duty as well as privilege to briefly bear testimony in this body, to which he was officially a stranger, to his great value as a public man, as a citizen, and as a friend. He was called to the discharge of the duties of a Representative with the well-earned appropriation of an officer faithful and trustworthy in the minutes. reputation of an officer faithful and trustworthy in the minutest detail and most difficult complications of a responsible public trust; and he brought to his new work the same earnestness and fidelity which had already won the confidence of his immediate fellow-citizens

There fell to his lot in the distribution of business among the members, as is the wont to the willing and the faithful, an unusual share of the labor in committee and upon the floor of the House. His patient, painstaking, and clear, well-balanced mind made him of great service in the committee-room, and his candor and plain straightforward business method gained him great influence in the management before the House of the business he had matured for its considera-He made little stir and less proclamation beforehand of any effort it became necessary for him to make, and after its performance he was content to let its merits commend it to the approval of his fellow-members and fellow-citizens.

In all he did modesty and self-distrust were handmaids of usefulness and success. Though no orator, he always spoke with effect, and was quite able in debate. What he had to say always had about it a directness and simplicity of statement and illustration so necessary to profitable discussion and for which the House always hungers. His usefulness as a member was recognized by his repeated appointment by different Speakers of opposite politics upon the most important standing committees of the House; and he thus participated largely in shaping the important measures brought from time to time before that body

In all the relations of private life Mr. Starkweather won the esteem and personal regard of all who knew him. Sincerity and frankness written on his countenance and illustrated in all his daily intercourse with his fellow-members were the charm of his social intercourse. He made no enemies, but many friends, who were attached to him till the end by the ties of companionship and brotherhood.

Purity of life and nobleness of aim and endeavor are the great lessons he has left for us who are still spared to further opportunity

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, Mr. Starkweather entered the Fortieth Congress, and served continuously until his death. No better evidence could be given of the confidence of the people whom he immediately served. He possessed ability and industry; and those who knew him intimately knew that he was generous, genial, and courteous in all his relations with his fellow-members. But he was so modest and retiring in his disposition that his excellent abilities were not always understood, and he was himself less known than many members of far less length of service and inferior capacity for usefulness.

Various circumstances during my service in the House of Repre-sentatives brought me in somewhat close association with Mr. Stark-WEATHER, and therefrom I had opportunity to better appreciate the sterling attributes of his character. From the knowledge of him thus gained I saw that he was able and retiring; that he was courageous in supporting his own convictions, while fair and generous in opposing the views of others; that his immediate constituents gained direct and exceptional benefits from his industry, while his zeal for the rect and exceptional benefits from his industry, while his zeal for the public good did not end with their interests.

The Congressional Globe and Record are not burdened with frequent essays from his pen; but on the rare occasions whereon he spoke it was obvious that his purpose was to influence the minds of his fellow-legislators, and he spoke with clearness, force, and precision.

He was useful as a legislator, sincere and consistent in his political convictions, faithful to his constituents, an earnest lover of his country, and honest to all men.

try, and honest to all men.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, again, as a Senator from Connecticut, am I compelled to the performance of a sad and mournful duty. Another honored son of my State has been stricken down in his harness; death came upon him, so to speak, while in the performance of his congressional duties.

HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, a Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Connecticut, died in Washington on the 28th day of January of this year.

Mr. STARKWEATHER was born in Preston, county of New London, State of Connecticut, on the 29th day of April, 1826.

His parents were respectable, but not wealthy people, and a life of hard manual labor seemed looming up before the youth, a life the

The ordinary work of a hard New England farm during the summer and teaching a district or common school in the winter months occupied his time for several years, when the ambition for advancement, so common to the New England youth, assumed control of his mind

At the age of twenty-two years he commenced the study of the law, and was admitted to the practice of that profession in the county of New London.

Mr. Starkweather did not possess a brilliant mind, nor had he the comprehensive, broad, and commanding intellect which forces immediate success in the profession which he had chosen. But, perhaps what was better, he was a devoted student and possessed habits of untiring industry which, before he arrived at middle age, enabled him to assume a fair position at the bar of his county, which num-bered among its members some of the ablest men in the State.

Mr. STARKWEATHER was but once a member of the Connecticut Legislature, and, therefore, when elected to the Fortieth Congress, his legislative experience was small.

He served through the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-third Congresses, and by the same untiring industry which had characterized his professional life he became an eminently useful member of the House. As a working member he had no superior, and though in his speeches never rising to eloquence, he always had the ear and commanded the high respect of his fellow-members.

Living in another part of the State, attached to another political ganization, my relations with Mr. STARKWEATHER were not of an intimate character, but always friendly. I had learned to regard him as one of the leading minds in his own political party and respected him accordingly.

Of high personal character, I shall be fully warranted in saying that those who knew him best loved him most.

Not fifty years of age when called from this sphere of action in the full maturity of his physical and intellectual power, his friends, the people of his State, entertained high hopes of his future conduct on the great theater whereon they had placed him.

But, sir, he has been called hence, and with sincere and truthful sorrow I mourn the loss of a valued colleague, and his State an eminent and trusted public servant.

Mr. President, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of Mr. Stark-Weather, late a member of the House of Representatives, the Senate do now ad-

The resolution was agreed to unanimously; and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. TEESE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2274) for the relief of the heirs of Jonathan Skinner, deceased, late of the State of New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution was adopted.

EULOGIES ON HON. ANDREW JOHNSON.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Committee on Printing have also instructed me to report, as a substitute for a resolution referred to them, the following, and to ask its adoption now:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Andrew Johnson, Ex-President of the United States, be printed; 9,000 for the use of the House and 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Johnson to accompany the same.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest that the language of the resolution be modified so as to read "late Senator and Ex-President." As the resolution now stands it would appear on the face of the record that we were printing the eulogies of a person who had had no connection with Congress at all. I suggest this as a mere matter of verbal accuracy.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have no objection to making that modification.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

GEORGE W. LABAW.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. The bill (H. R. No. 1386) for the relief of George W. Labaw, of Jersey City, New Jersey, was improperly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I ask unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents. There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LUCIEN LOESER.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. Some days ago I filed at the Clerk's desk and had referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a petition of Lucien Loeser, asking to be relieved from liability to the Government for the loss by the wreck of the steamer San Francisco of public property in his possession as an officer of the Army. Subsequent information leads me to think that the petition should properly have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask, therefore, that that petition, together with a supplementary one on the same subject, be referred to the latter committee.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

TIMBER-CUTTING ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

Mr. JACOBS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2275) to authorize Indians to cut timber on heavily-timbered reservations in such quantities and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. DURAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2276) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to limit the transfer of causes thereto from the State courts in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DAMAGES BY DISTRICT IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. CATE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2277) for the equalization and settlement of all claims for damages sustained by reason of public improvements and repairs in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. COX. By request of many members I ask unanimous consent that Saturday next be set apart for debate only, as in Committee of the Whole, no business to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made. There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TITLE OF HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS

Mr. GUNTER. On behalf of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I ask to have printed the proof accompanying the bill (H. R. No. 830) extending the time for filing suits in the Court of Claims to establish title to the Hot Springs, Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman make a brief statement as to the nature and extent of the proof which he selve to have printed.

which he asks to have printed.

Mr. GUNTER. The proof is very extensive; it is all in manuscript, and badly written. The committee desire to have it printed in order to facilitate their investigation.

Mr. FORT. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Printing?

Mr. GUNTER. No, sir.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, before which the bill is pending.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman consent to refer it to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. GUNTER. I will, if you object to my proposition.
The SPEAKER. The more regular practice would be for the gentleman from Arkansas to reduce his motion to writing, and have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GUNTER. I will do that, if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to ordering the testimony to be printed?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman states it is very long, and I think the question should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GUNTER. Then I will introduce a resolution on the subject, and have it referred to that committee.

PORT OF ENTRY, TECHE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. DARRALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2278) to change the name of the port of entry of the district of the Teche, Louisiana, from Brashear to Morgan City; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2279) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to grant to the chiefs of the Bureaus of the Executive Departments the privilege of using and drawing books from the Library; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Joint Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. M. A. ELLIOTT.

Mr. RIDDLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2280) for the relief of Mrs. M. A. Elliott, of Sumner County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON WAGON AND CARRIAGE AXLES.

Mr. MacDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2281) fixing the rate of duty on wagon and carriage axles; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PORT OF GENESEE, NEW YORK.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2282) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive; which was read a first and second

The bill, which was read, provides that the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive, be, and they are hereby, extended to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask for the reading of the accompanying report, which is very short.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill No. 704, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to submit the following report:
Your committee have been informed by satisfactory evidence that importers, residents at Genesee, suffer much by delays to their goods at New York. We addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and received the following reply:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 7, 1876.

Washington, February 7, 1876.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, inclosing for the opinion of this Department a bill introduced in Congress on the 10th ultimo to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes.

The sections of law referred to permit merchandise imported at various designated ports to be shipped to various other designated ports without examination or appraisement at the port of first arrival. In view of the fact that the city of Rochester is situated within the limits of the collection district of Genesee and that the custom-house is located at that place, I know of no good reason why the bill in question should not become a law. It is suggested, however, that a verbal alteration should be made in the bill by substituting the word "sections" for "section," as the bill covers eight sections of law.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW.

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. M. H. Dunnell, House of Representatives.

Inasmuch as there is no increase of expenditure to the Government by the passage of this bill, we report back the following bill as a substitute for House bill 704, and recommend that the same do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; an t being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ experts in prosecuting the investigation of the affairs of said District ordered by this House by resolution of January 31, 1876.

TEN PER CENT. REDUCTION OF DUTY.

Mr. BURCHARD. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask for the printing of a document from the Secretary of the Treasury, referred to that committee, containing a statement of the value and amount of duty received on certain articles subject to the reduction of 10 per cent. of duty under act of June 6, 1872, entered into consumption in the United States during the quarters ending June 30 and September 30, 1874 and 1875, respectively; also values of imports for the same periods.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TREATY WITH THE KING OF THE HAWAHAN ISLANDS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back a bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th January, 1875, with the recommendation that it do pass. I move that the bill and report be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Thursday next at two o'clock, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it to be made the special order for each day at two o'clock?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. No. We can probably get through with it in one day.

Mr. RANDALL. I wished to give the gentleman more time.

Mr. Wood's motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the regular order. Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is the demand insisted on?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at eighteen minutes before one o'clock, and the regular order this morning is the calling of committees for reports of a public nature.

Mr. HUNTON. Is not the unfinished business of yesterday the first

The call this morning rests with the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812. The Chair will remark that the Committee on Territories are entitled to no further time now, because they have already consumed two morning hours.

There were no reports from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions

MEXICAN, FLORIDA, AND BLACK HAWK WARS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom were referred a number of bills granting pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war, the Florida war, and the Black Hawk war, have instructed me to report a substitute for the same. I ask that the substitute and accompanying report be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for part Wednesday at two of clock.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the titles of the bills reported back by the committee.

The titles of the bills were read, as follows:

The bill (H. R. No. 86) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Mexico, and the widows of deceased soldiers and sailors. and sailors:

The bill (H. R. No. 260) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1846 with Mexico, and the widows of deceased soldiers and sailors;

The bill (H. R. No. 317) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1846 with Mexico, and the widows of deceased sailors of the war of 1846 with Mexico, and the widows of deceased soldiers and sailors;

The bill (H. R. No. 1143) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war;

The bill (H. R. No. 784) granting pensions to the soldiers of the Seminole and Florida wars; and

The bill (H. R. No. 474) to provide pensions for the soldiers of the war with Mexico and the Seminole war of 1836.

war with Mexico and the Seminole war of 1836.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2283) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican, Florida, and Black Hawk wars, and certain widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the same, was received and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Hewitt,] that the substitute reported for the several bills the titles of which have been read be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order therein for Wednesday next at two o'clock? the special order therein for Wednesday next at two o'clock !

the special order therein for Wednesday next at two o'clock?

Mr. KASSON. I think I must object to so much of the proposition as makes the bill a special order. The condition of business as I understand it likely to be next week will be such that I think it hardly necessary to make the bill a special order; and the accumulation of special orders always interferes seriously with the progress of the House in the transaction of business. I object to making the bill a special order. I think it unnecessary, as we may probably be able to reach it in the ordinary course of business at the time indicated.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The proposition is not to make it a special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. I think it safer at the present stage of business not to make it a special order. I am not aware, however, of all the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will state for the information of the gentleman that the committee propose to allow full discussion; that they have no thought of limiting discussion.

The bill and accompanying report were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. DURHAM, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1327 a bill (H. R. No. 2284) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes, concerning mineral lands; which was read a first and second time.

The substitute was read at length.

Mr. DURHAM. If the Clerk will send me the original bill, I will

Mr. DURHAM. If the Cierk will send me the original bill, I will endeavor to explain the nature of the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the substitute has not been printed.

Mr. PAGE. I was about to make that suggestion.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to explain as succinctly as I can the object and purpose of this bill, and after I shall have done that, if gentlemen desire to have the substitute printed and referred back to the committee, and I can enter a motion to reconsider so as to get the bill up at the proper time, I will have no objection.

Upon the reading of the bill it might seem to the House that the question involved in it was of a somewhat complicated character; but it is very simple, as gentlemen will see when I explain it. The law as it now stands provides that before any persons can make entries on mining lands they must use a certain amount of labor and work, for instance, five hundred dollars' worth. They must then take a surveyor and lay off the boundaries, and then under a section of the Revised Statutes they are obliged to do one hundred dollars' worth of work per year until their patents are issued.

Now, those gentlemen who live in the Territories and represent these large mining districts say that this in many instances works very great hardship, that controversies arise about these patents, and even where there is no controversy, under the most favorable circumstances, where a man has made his application, has had his survey made, and performed everything required of him under the statute, his application lies in the Land Office two long years before the patent can be issued. In the mean time he is required to do one hundred ent can be issued. In the mean time he is required to do one hundred dollars' worth of work per year under the statute.

Now, the object of the substitute is simply this: to provide that if the person who proposes to patent mining lands shall in the first place have done his five hundred dollars' worth of work, has had his surveys made and his lands surveyed, and has made all the specifications necessary, and when he has filed them in the Land Office under the statute he can then stop doing his one hundred dollars' worth of work a year until the patent is issued. That is the sum and substance of the whole substitute, and that is the object and purpose of the bill. It is simply to provide that where a man undertakes to get his patent, pays his money, has his surveys made, performs all his duties under the statute, he may cease his one hundred dollars' worth of work a year and not await the slow process of procuring his patent. In many instances many grave questions arise. There are conflicts growing out of these patent-rights which are sometimes held in the courts for five years, and the man under the existing statute is re-growing out of these patent-rights which are sometimes held in the courts for five years, and the man under the existing statute is required to perform his one hundred dollars' worth of work per year and is finally ejected from his claim and gets nothing for his time, trouble, and expense. But the object of this bill is to say that after he shall have paid his money and filed his survey, then he shall cease performing his one hundred dollars' worth of work per year until his application for a patent has been determined in the Land Office, or in the court where the litigation may spring up.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to inquire whether the committee in framing this bill regarded the mineral lands as a legitimate subject of speculation without development, or whether they proceeded on the prin-this bill regarded the mineral lands as a legitimate subject of speculation without development, or whether they proceeded on the principle, which for one I have struggled for for many years on this floor, that no man ought to take control of mineral lands of the country except on the condition that he shall develop them for the good of the country? The point I fear in this bill is that it proposes to take away the very insufficient security for developing that we now have. The claimant for a patent now cannot abandon the development of the land until the patent is issued, and God grant the day may soon come when he can never abandon it for three years without its falling back into the public domain.

Mr. DURHAM. Wait until I answer one question before you ask me another. I will say that the committee have considered that very question, and the substitute as reported by the committee undertakes to carry out the very object and purpose which the gentleman has in view. If the gentleman will turn to the Revised Statutes he will see that no man can locate a mining claim until he has done five hundred dollars' worth of work upon it.

Mr. KASSON. I fear I did not make myself understood. The bill reported by the gentleman proposes that the claimant shall not continue to work until his patent is issued, but only until he has filed his application and paid the money. It allows him to stop work upon his claim before, under the present law, he is permitted to stop work.

Mr. DURHAM. I understand that; that is just precisely the object of this bill, that when a man has performed five hundred dollars' worth of work, has surveyed the property proposed to be patented and done his one hundred dollars' worth of work per year until he has paid the whole purchase-money, has done everything required of him by the statute, then when the Government alone is in fault in failing to issue the patent to him, the object of this bill is to protect him from further work until the patent is issued.

Mr. KASSON. That is the point. Ought he not to be required to perform work and develop the mining interests for the benefit of the country?

Mr. DURHAM. He is required to perform work until he has performed all that is required under the present law.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PAGE. I desire to ask the consent of the gentleman who has this bill in charge that it may be printed and made the special order for some certain day.

Mr. DURHAM. I will consent to that if the House will agree to it.

Mr. PAGE. The substitute has not been printed, and thus far no member of the House, except the members of the Committee on Mines and Mining, has been able to read it. As one of the representatives in part of a mining constituency, I desire that this substitute may be printed, in order that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. DURHAM. I have no earthly objection to that, and desire to have it done. If it is the pleasure of the House to have the substi-ing law as it now exists.

Mr. DURHAM. I think, if the House will give us the benefit of the morning hour, we can dispose of the whole matter in a short time when the substitute is printed and gentlemen can compare it with the present law.

Mr.LUTTRELL. I hope the proposition of my colleague [Mr.PAGE] will prevail. This is a very important bill for the mining interests of my State, and as a practical miner, in behalf of the interests of those miners, I hope this substitute will be printed and made a special order.

Mr. PAGE. I have moved that the substitute be printed and made a special order for two weeks from to-day at two o'clock.

Mr. DURHAM. After the morning hour.

Mr. PAGE. Yes, after the morning hour.
Mr. PATTERSON. This bill originated with myself, and results from the many evils and hardships that befall miners on account of what I believe to be the unintentional injustice of the law as it now It is a bill of great importance, because now owners of mines stands. It is a bill of great importance, because now owners of mines are liable to lose their mines by their being jumped unless relief of some kind is given them. We think this bill will give the relief desired, and at the same time will take away none of the safeguards that the present law throws around the mines to prevent them from being taken up by claimants who never intend to work them and who do not hold them in good faith. Of course we want the fullest consideration of the measure, and whatever steps can be taken to secure that will not be

Mr. HOAR. Does that require unanimous consent or can it be determined by a majority vote?

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

MINING LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the

"An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The bill, which was read, provides that within the State of Missouri deposits of coal, iron, lead, or other mineral shall be excluded from the operation of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872; that said act shall not apply to the mineral lands situate and being in said State; that said lands are thereby declared free and open to exploration and purchase, according to the legal subdivisions thereof, as before the passage of said act; and that any bona fide entries of such lands within said State since the passage thereof may be patented without reference to the provisions of said act.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the following:

following:

And said act shall not apply to the mineral lands situate and being in said State, and that said lands are hereby declared free and open to exploration and purchase according to the legal subdivisions thereof as before the passage of said act; and that any bona fide entries of such lands within said State since the passage thereof may be patented without reference to the provisions of said act.

Mr. PAGE. Does this bill apply to mining lands in any other State except Missouri?

Mr. BLAND. It does not. The bill is perfectly right, and the same principle has been applied to nearly every other State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have instructed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1637) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866," approved March 2, 1867.. This bill does not properly belong to our committee. I move that they be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

BURLEIGH COUNTY, DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. DURHAM. The same committee have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2116) modifying a part of chapter 25 of the laws of 1872 and 1873 of the Territory of Dakota so far as the county of Burleigh is concerned, and to move that they be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have also directed me to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2126) to enforce section 162 of the Revised Statutes, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF SURGEONS, ASSISTANT SURGEONS, ETC.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws

Mr. SOUTHARD. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have directed me to report back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1677) to correct a mistake in and amend section 1375 of the Revised Statutes, and to recommend its passage.

The bill was read. It provides that the words "who shall receive the highest shore-pay of his grade" be appended to section 1375, chapter 1, title 15, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; so that the section will read:

SEC. 1375. A surgeon, assistant surgeon, or passed assistant surgeon may be detailed as assistant to the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, who shall receive the highest shore-pay of his grade.

The second section provides that this provision shall have effect as if the same had been a part of the section at the time of its enactment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. This bill provides simply for the restoration of the words "who shall receive the highest shore-pay of his grade," which, in transferring the law of 1862 to the Revised Statutes, were accidently omitted. The bill affects but one officer; that is the passed assistant surgeon detailed as assistant in the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. The bill has received the unanimous approval of the committee. I call for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ABOLITION OF PRESIDENT AND SENATE, ETC.

Mr. DENISON, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back the following memorials, and moved that the commit-tee be discharged from their further consideration and that they be

DURATION OF PATENTS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Patents, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1943) limiting the duration patents, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REVENUES OF THE PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The Committee on Patents have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 710) to protect the revenues of the Patent Office, and to recommend its passage with an amend-

The bill was read. It provides that any officer, clerk, or employé in the Patent Office who shall receive any money or valuable thing in the Patent Office who shall receive any money or valuable thing (other than the regular salary) for his private and personal benefit for any work done in or pertaining to the Patent Office, either in or out of office hours, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished, on conviction thereof in any Federal court, by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by a fine of not less than $1,000, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment of the committee, which was read, was to strike out in the ninth line of the bill the words "less than," and insert in lieu thereof the word "exceeding;" so as to read, "by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by a fine of not less than $1,000, or by both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The object of this bill, which meets the discretion of the court."

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The object of this bill, which meets the approval of the Commissioner of Patents, is to protect the Patent Office in its revenues. It seems that there has grown up among the employés of the Patent Office a custom of using hours after the regular service of the Office is closed in copying documents for which the persons doing this copying receive pay, which is applied to their own private use, instead of being turned over to the Treasury. The design of this bill is that all business of that kind shall hereafter be transacted regularly in office hours and that the proceeds shall go into the Treasury. I presume there will be no objection to the passage of this measure. of this measure.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GROUNDS FOR CUSTOM-HOUSE, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 664, a bill (H. R. No. 2255) making appropriation for the purchase of additional grounds for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to apply so much of the money heretofore appropriated for a customhouse and post-office at Nashville, Tennessee, (not, however, exceeding $18,500.) for the purchase of the ground situated in that city between the western boundary line of the present custom-house lot on Spruce street, fronting one hundred and sixty-five feet on Broad street, and running back some distance to an alley, or such part thereof as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, if, in his judgment, the public interests require additional land for said building, provided that the amount heretofore fixed by law as the cost of the building shall be reduced to the extent of the sum that shall be applied in the purchase of the additional ground.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think a point of order lies to this bill. t makes an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, and therefore should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. It makes no appropriation from the Treasury, but merely transfers from one fund to another, and I do not think it is liable to the point of order suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the title and first section of the bill be again read, from which it will appear I think that the bill does

Mr. HOUSE. The bill does not make the appropriation of a single dollar out of the Treasury, but simply transfers from one fund to another. I hope the House will pass the bill at this time, as the work is suspended awaiting the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How much does the bill appropriate?

Mr. YOUNG. Eighteen thousand dollars for the purchase of additional ground which is shown to be entirely necessary. There is no appropriation at all. It is taken out of an appropriation already made for this purpose. The work is now suspended, as I have already said, waiting for the passage of this bill.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2286) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-rooms, &c., in the city of Memphis; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the lot or parcel of ground in the city of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, granted and donated by ordinance of the general council of said city, under authority of an act of the Legislature of said State of Tennessee, for a site upon which to erect a custom-house, post-office, bonded warehouse, and court-rooms, be accepted by the Government of the United States for the purposes aforesaid, on which shall be erected the building authorized by the act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause plans and estimates to be made Secretary of the Treasury to cause plans and estimates to be made and a suitable site provided for a public building at Memphis, Tennessee," approved February 21, 1873, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall employ the means necessary to secure the benefits to the United States of said donation, provided, however, the title of the United States to said ground shall be made good and sufficient, and provided further that the cost of the building so to be located shall not exceed $600,000 not exceed $600,000.

The second section provides that the act of Congress approved February 21, 1873, entitled "An act to provide for the building of a custom-house," &c., in the city of Memphis, in the State of Tenuessee, and for other purposes, be so amended as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the lot of ground now owned by the Government of the United States, on the corner of Jefferson and Third streets, in the said city of Memphis, Tennessee, for cash, within six months from the passage of this act, after advertising for bids for a period of thirty days in two papers published in the city of Memphis, and in such other manner as he may deem proper; and the proceeds arising from such sale shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out $600,000 and in lieu thereof to insert $400.000: and, with the permission of the gentleman from Ten-

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out $600,000 and in lieu thereof to insert $400,000; and, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee who has charge of this bill, I desire to say this: In 1873 an appropriation of $75,000 was made to begin the construction of a custom-house at the city of Memphis, Tennessee. The ground owned by the Government of the United States for the site designed to be employed for that purpose was ordered to be sold and other property secured upon which this building should be erected, but no limit was imposed upon the cost of the building thus to be erected. The Secretary of the Treasury therefore declined taking any steps toward the construction of such a building until Congress had imposed a limit, as the Secretary of the Treasury is by law required in the construction of such buildings to bring them within the limit prescribed by law. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury has recommended that the cost of this building shall not exceed $800,000.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or a majority of that committee, have agreed to report this bill as the gentleman from that committee, have agreed to report this bill as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Young] has reported it, limiting the cost of this structure to $600,000. I move now to reduce the amount to $400,000 as the limit of expenditure which shall be authorized in the erection of this building, independent of the site for the same.

The House will perceive that this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to accept, on behalf of the city of Memphis, the ground for the site of the building. That donation, as will be perhaps more fully explained by the gentleman from Tennessee, is made on the condition that the Government will take some steps toward the erection dition that the Government will take some steps toward the erection of this building by the month of May of the present year; and the bill directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take such steps as shall secure the benefit of that donation. But I object, sir, to the amount of the appropriation contemplated by this bill. I think the amount is too large. We cannot continue this practice of the appropriation of such enormous sums of money for the erection of public buildings. We have expended within the last four or five years an amount of money in the erection of palatial buildings all over this country that should have extended through a period of a quarter of a century.

The millions that we are expending out of the public Treasury to erect public buildings in our principal commercial cities are, to be sure, embellishing those cities, but they do it beyond the necessities of the public service and at the expense of the whole industry of this country. I think, sir, that that policy should cease. The number of these buildings now upon our hands for erection is making very heavy drafts upon the Treasury of the country, and I hope that in authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed with the construction of this building a reasonable limit will be imposed on the cost of the Memphis is a city having a population of sixty or seventy thousand souls. Comparing the amount appropriated for public buildings in other similar cities I find $300,000, $350,000, or $400,000 has been the usual limit, while this bill authorizes the entering upon the construction of a building according to a plan which will cost ultimately $600,000. In the capital of my own State, a city of large and growing population, the Government has expended $340,000 in the erection of a public building of such proportions as would assay for any of a public building of such proportions as would answer for any one of the second class cities of this country for a long time to come. And in view of the very heavy drains now made upon the Treasury by buildings in progress of erection and of the magnitude of the structures authorized that are already in progress, I insist that we should be cautious in entering upon the construction of these buildings and should limit the cost to a reasonable sum.

It must be borne in mind, too, that we are gradually coming down to a heavy reduction of the currency of the country. Gentlemen are clamoring for a resumption of specie payments and the reduction of our currency to a specie standard. This would reduce the cost of erecting buildings. It would reduce the value of labor and all values everywhere. Future expenditure, therefore, ought to be authorized on the basis of the reduced cost of construction.

I trust, sir, that this amendment will be adopted; so that if a building is authorized to be erected at Memphis, Tennessee, which may be a thing proper and right of itself—I am not objecting to that—it shall be authorized to be constructed at least with a reasonable limit of expenditure; and $400,000 it seems to me will erect a building of sufficient magnitude for any of the cities of this country, unless it may be a few of the first-class cities like New York, Chicago, and Saint Louis.

I do not desire to do injustice to the city of Memphis or any city of the country. But I insist that the policy of lavish expenditure shall cease; that in the erection of buildings, as in everything else, there shall be a regard to economy; that hundreds of thousands of dollars shall not be expended in mere ornamentation, which adds nothing to the real value of public buildings and indeed detracts from it, as simplicity and solidity are the qualities that should characterize a public structure and not those embellishments which set it off as a matter

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] by inserting $500,000 instead of $400,000.

It has been already stated that the Treasury Department estimated $800,000 as the cost of this building. The city of Memphis has donated a site on which to erect it which is estimated to be worth $300,000. It appears to me that $500,000 is the smallest sum for which we can attempt to erect a building there suitable for the purposes for which it is intended. It must be remembered by the House that the expense of constructing these buildings has increased 33 per cent, over what it cost when many of our public buildings were erected. I do not desire that a public building shall be erected at Memphis which will not be found suitable for the business at that point. They have there a very extensive post-office business. The customs business they have to do is considerable and also the internal-revenue business. I believe that $500,000 would meet the approbation of the Representative of that city, who is also a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. YOUNG. I am obliged to my friend, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Wells,] for coming to my assistance in the hour of my calamity brought upon me by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Hol-MAN.

I will not enter upon a discussion of financial questions with that distinguished gentleman, for we might not after all differ very widely upon that important subject, unless, perhaps, he might conclude in this instance to give some appearance of truth to the belief very generally entertained, that as a matter of principle he opposes everything in which the word money or appropriation happens to occur. Nor do I propose to discuss with him the more classic question of architecture in its different styles, the Corinthian or the Gothic, the sacred or pro-

But upon the question of the cost of the building proposed to be constructed under this bill, I have sought the opinion of higher authority than even the gentleman or myself. Under direction of the committee of which he is the chairman, I addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting him to give his opinion as to the amount which the building should cost. He, it seems, referred the matter to the proper officer for his report; that I have in the letter which I now hold in my hand, and ask that it may be read by the Clerk. The Clerk read as follows:

PK read as 10110ws.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,

January 25, 1876.

SIR: Acknowledging the receipt, by reference from you, of a communication from Hon. Casey Young, who has been instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to obtain the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount necessary for the construction of a suitable building in Memphis, Tennessee, for the various Government offices in that city, I have the honor to inform you that, as the building proposed to be erected is to provide accommodations for the custom-house, bonded warerooms, court-rooms, post-office, and other Government offices, and in view of the space required to accommodate the various officers in all the branches of the service, a proper building could not be erected for a sum less than $500,000. The size, importance, and growth of the city of Memphis and the probable necessity for increased accommodations must be taken into consideration, as well as the size and beauty of the site donated by the city. The rates of materials, compared with those paid at other places where Government buildings are being erected, is also considered in determining the limit of the cost; and, in view of all these facts, I am of the opinion that the limit to be fixed should not be below the sum above named.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. POTTER, Supervising Architect.

Hon. B. H. Bristow, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. YOUNG. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a few minutes I think I can convince its members that this bill ought to pass in its present form.

I appreciate the spirit of economy that actuates the gentleman from Indiana in opposing this measure, and I would be very far from asking from this Congress any appropriation of public money that I did not think I was perfectly justified in asking for in the present depressed financial condition of the country. But no appropriation is asked for at present.

Fifteen years ago a site was purchased by the Government in the city of Memphis upon which to erect a custom-house. No further steps were taken until 1872, when a law was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell that site, if deemed advisable, and purchase a more eligible one, and also making an appropriation for the commencement of the building. Subsequently the city of Memphis by action of its general council donated to the Government a lot of ground upon which to erect a custom-house, post-office, court-rooms, &c., which is to-day worth $300,000; and surely the Government ought now to be quite as liberal on its part.

Memphis is the largest and most important city on the Mississoppi

Memphis is the largest and most important city on the Mississeppi River between Saint Louis and New Orleans. It is, I believe, the fourth largest cotton mart in the United States, and perhaps there are not half a dozen cities in the world where more cotton is bought and sold than there is at that place. It is the commercial emporium of three of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a completion of 6000 cools with a proceedings and the commercial control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and wealthiest Southern States, having a control of the largest and the states are control of the largest and the st population of 60,000 people, with a prospective increase to 100,000 within the present generation. In three years alone it paid into the Federal Treasury nearly $40,000,000 as a tax upon the cotton grown in the surrounding country. Forty-one hundred vessels annually leave its wharf freighted with agricultural products, which incidentally and directly pours into the national Treasury a stream of wealth whose tide never ceases to flow. It has a circuit and district court of the United States, in which there is perhaps now pending as much and as important litigation as at any other place within the entire judicial circuit in which it is situated. I am informed by a statement which I have just received from the Postmaster-General, in response to an inquiry which I addressed to him on that subject a day or two ago, that its post-office yields an income of $65,000 a year, which is greater than that paid by the office in any other city on the Mississippi River except Saint Louis and New Orleans.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] is mistaken in supposing that the limit fixed in this bill is in excess of the amount heretofore appropriated for the construction of similar buildings in other sections of the country. I venture the assertion, and an examination of the statistics on that subject will establish its truth, that there never has been an appropriation made by the Government for the erection of a building similar to the one contemplated in this bill, and in a city of the size and importance of Memphis, that did not go very far beyond the amount here asked for. To illustrate, I will go first to the gentleman's own State. The town of Evansville, with a population of about thirty thousand people, clearing about eighteen hundred vessels per year, with a postal revenue of only $24,000 per annum, with no United States courts, has succeeded, and perhaps with the gentleman's vote, in securing an appropriation of $300,000 to build a custom-house alone. The interior city of Indianapolis, where a water-craft was never seen, has received an appropriation of $350,000 for the erection of a post-office and court-rooms alone.

From these illustrations it would seem that economy, unlike charity, does not begin at home, at least not at the home of those who undertake to teach it. The city of Milwaukee, to which the gentleman undertake to teach it. The city of Milwaukee, to which the gentleman has alluded, is, to be sure, a large, a flourishing one; but he omitted to inform the House that the appropriation of $229,949 given to that place was for the construction of a custom-house alone, while this bill provides for the erection of a building suited not only for a custom-house but for a post-office, bonded warehouse, court-rooms, and all other offices necessary for the transaction of the Government business at that place. Now, taking into consideration the facts to which I have referred, the present and future importance of the city of Memphis, the beauty and value of the site it has donated to the Government, I submit to the House that $600,000 is a small limit indeed within which the cost of the proposed structure shall be confined.

Anxious not to go beyond what I supposed the spirit of economy which seems to actuate this House would warrant, while this bill was pending before the committee which has reported it I waited upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect to ascertain their opinion as to how much the building should cost, and after a careful examination of the subject, and after I had requested them not to fix a greater limit than they thought was really neces-sary, these gentlemen, who may be supposed to know better than either myself or the gentleman from Indiana the necessary cost of erecting public buildings, fixed the limit at $800,000. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in deference mainly to the opinion of the chairman and with no very great opposition on my part, saw proper to reduce it to the sum of $600,000. After all this, I insist that it would be unfair and unjust to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the limit and appear to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the limit and unjust to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the limit and unjust to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the limit and unjust to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the city and section of country which I represent to add to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and section of country which I represent to the city and try which I represent to reduce this limit $200,000, as proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, or even $100,000, as proposed by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. Wells.] I appeal to the generosity of gentlemen on both sides to give this bill their support, and to allow it to pass as reported.

I now move the previous question.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment while I ask him a question?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not intend to make any remarks upon Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not intend to make any remarks upon this subject, and I should be very sorry to make an ungracious one; but the gentleman who last spoke has referred to the Supervising Architect, and to suggestions from the Treasury Department as the highest authority in respect to the reasonable cost of the proposed new custom-house at Memphis, and although I belong to the party which supports the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not accept the suggestions of that Department as the proper authority in respect to the secret of public health of the supports of public health of the supports of public health of the support of the supp cost of public buildings.

We have heard much justly said of the extravagance which has everywhere prevailed in our country of late, and if there is any department of Government where it has prevailed, it has been in respect to Government buildings. So convinced am I of this that if I had the power, if my judgment should be accepted, I would say stop making any further appropriations for new buildings until we find a better level for judicious estimates. I represent a city of five hundred thousand inhabitants, and within a day or two, it will be remembered, a bill has been proposed to condemn ground for a post-office in that city. Well, sir, the city of Brooklyn needs a post-office. It needs it very much, and has needed it for ten years. But I stand here its Representative to oppose the building of any extravagant post-office there, any post-office the estimates of which shall spring from the Supervising Architect or from the Treasury Department, guided by recent wasteful precedents. wasteful precedents.

Mr. MacDOUGAL. I would ask the gentleman whose authority he

Mr. MacDOUGAL. I would ask the gentleman whose authority he would take for an estimate for this purpose?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Well, sir, I will come to that perhaps before I stop. The point I make is, that estimates which come from the Treasury Department at the present time are on a scale of extravagance, or on a scale which we have all joined in denouncing as extravagant, springing from the grand impulse which an excessive volume of paper money has given to all undertakings in the country, and so we have constructed buildings everywhere wastefully and on a scale of useless grandeur which the country cannot support.

Now, in regard to Memphis, I believe that a custom-house costing

Now, in regard to Memphis, I believe that a custom-house costing $400,000 would be equal to all the demands of that place for the next twenty or even fifty years, and that when we are here carving and cutting down expenses in very direction we should not exceed that

. Mr. YOUNG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. On what does he base his opinion as to the cost of a custom-house at Memphis?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I believe that you can build to-day as good a building in Memphis for $400,000 as could have been built for $500,000 three years ago, or nearly that. In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, or any of the chief cities of the country, $400,000 to-day should go or any of the effectives of the contry, $400,000 to-day should go nearly as far as $800,000 did go then.

Mr. YOUNG. Pardon me, but the gentleman did not understand my question; it is on what facts he bases his opinion as to the cost of a custom-house at Memphis now or any other time.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have had business relations with Memphis for twenty-five years, and I know something about it. I know enough about it to distrust by at least 30 per cent. the cash value which you put upon the lot donated to the Government for a custom-house. 'rom what I know of the value of real estate in Memphis, I do not believe that the lot which you estimate to be worth $300,000 is really worth to-day $200,000, or that any man, with all the abundance of money now in circulation, can be found to give any such sum for it. distrust all these estimates in round numbers which are made upon the old basis upon which we have been constructing public buildings and works.

As I was saying, Brooklyn will be here asking for an appropriation to build a post-office, and as her representative I stand here to oppose anything that may seem extravagant and which is based upon estimates loosely made or made upon the theories upon which most public buildings have been constructed for years past.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. CHITTENDEN. Certainly.
Mr. THORNBURGH. Has not the Government of the United States just expended $8,000,000 in constructing a post-office building for New York City?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I do not know the amount.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Are you not like the old lady who got her Mr. THORNBURGH. Are you not have the old lady who got her kettle mended and then refused either to borrow or lend?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. No, not that. I do not remember the amount which was first appropriated for the New York post-office.

Mr. THORNBURGH. There have been eight millions expended.

which was first appropriated for the New York post-office.

Mr. THORNBURGH. There have been eight millions expended.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Very well. The amount first appropriated was, perhaps, $1,500,000; and your suggestion implies that in respect to the Memphis custom-house you are going to take us over the same costly road we have traveled in building the New York post-office. If the suggestion of the gentleman has any pertinence at all, it means that the $500,000 now proposed to be appropriated for this purpose will involve two or three millions before you get through. That is the very point of danger. It is because the post-office at New York has cost many times the original estimate, it is because the capitol of my own State is likely to cost five times the original estimate, it is because our great public works have led to the squandering of money by millions, that I am opposed now in this particular juncture, when we have abolished the band at West Point and reduced the provisions for cadets by three-quarters of a ration a day—because of all this, I for cadets by three-quarters of a ration a day—because of all this, I am opposed to beginning an expenditure at Memphis with $500,000, which in the end may cost $2,000,000.

It is for such reasons that I rise now to protest against going into an enterprise of this kind on vague estimates. The real difficulty in regard to these public buildings is that we have proceeded carelessly, blindly, and upon the principle that the Government was rich, had plenty of money, and that it must build grandly, with regard to the centuries to come. I would not say one word against a liberal and proper appropriation for the building of a custom-house at Memphis, but I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House who expect us to stand by them in every proper effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government to be careful in appropriating $500,000 or $600,000 to begin a work of this sort when, according to our New York experi-ence, it will in the end cost two or three millions of dollars.

Mr. YOUNG. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Kelley, and then I will say a word or two in reply to the gen-

[Mr. Kelley,] and then I will say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Chittenen.]

Mr. Kelley. I desire to make some general suggestions upon this subject, in reply to the gentleman from Brooklyn, [Mr. Chittenen.]

I hope we will not, because the industry of the country is paralyzed and its revenue reduced, order the construction of any public building on a mean and inadequate scale. The buildings we are to erect are for all time, and not, as the gentleman suggests, for twenty years. I trust that no building that is to be known as the shelter of the officers of the United States shall be erected in any State that will be found cramped, crowded, and inadequate twenty or twenty-five years or even a half a century hence. The South has few public buildings. She should have them on the same scale that we have had them provided for us at the North. If we are not now able to make adequate appropriations for that purpose, let us postpone the construction of them until we shall be able to do so. But whenever we provide a building let it be done with reference to the idea that the Union is eternal, that we build for the future, and for the great people of our country as they are to be numbered in the future.

I have been at Memphis; I have marked its great future possibilities. I would rather vote a too liberal appropriation for national buildings in that city than to vote for one which should be adequate to the growth of the country for only twenty years, and become a disgrace before a half a century shall have passed. I do not know the value or the character of the lot proposed for a site for this building. The gentleman from Brooklyn says it would not now bring $200,000. I apprehend it would not bring anything. And why? Because the banking classes of the country have destroyed values and made the real estate of the country a burden to the people.

Let the sails of commerce once more be spread, let the hum of industry be again heard throughout the land, give to the people a medium of exchange whereby capital can purchase materials and pay for labor, and our revenues will again flow in in the rich streams that they did in the better days, before Hugh McCulloch hamstrung the industries of the country. Then we will not feel that to build an adequate building in a great commercial center in the heart of our I have been at Memphis; I have marked its great future possibili-equate building in a great commercial center in the heart of our country is a burden upon the people.

Mr. YOUNG. Without desiring to pursue this discussion further, I,wish to say a single word—and scarcely more than that—in reply to one portion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.] I cannot conclude that any member of this body could so far forget the proprieties of parliamentary debate as even to intimate intentionally and purposely that a fellow-member would state any fact which was not true. Sir, not for the sake of securing all the benefits of this bill for my city; not for the palatial building erected by Goverment aid in sight of the gentleman's own door; not for all the wealth of his great city, would I make a statement to this House which I did not believe to be true. What I say upon this floor I say upon my honor and responsibility as a member of the American Congress; if I were to do otherwise I should be unworthy of the seat which I occupy in this body and would lose the confidence and respect of the honest and intelligent constituency whom I have and respect of the honest and intelligent constituency whom I have the honor to represent.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not intend to impeach the gentleman's veracity. I intended nothing disrespectful.

Mr. YOUNG. I presume not, of course. I acquit you of any such purpose, but still your language might admit of a different construction. But I again repeat that the property donated by the city of Memphis to the Government is worth the sum of $300,000—the gentleman's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. THORNBURGH. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from

Mr. THORNBURGH. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] especially that portion in which he said that the estimates of the Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury cannot be relied upon and are much too great, I desire to tell him that those officers estimated too little for the great post-office in the city of New York and they are here now asking for a deficit of $400,000 to make up the amount necessary to complete the building, and that too after the Government has paid to the gentleman's city for that purpose $8,140,690.14. If they estimated too much for the building in Memphis, they estimated too little for that public building in New York; and that being so, you will find my colleagues and myself ready to assist in completing that building, although over $8,000,000 have already been expended upon it. That is all I desire to say. to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Young] yield to me ?

Mr. YOUNG. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from

Mr. YOUNG. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I am somewhat surprised to hear it charged by the gentleman from New York that the present Supervising Architect of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Treasury would be likely to make too high an estimate for any public building whatever. From my conversations with those gentlemen and from what I have observed of their recommendations, I am free to say that they have been unusually prudent, careful, and economical in their recommendations. They have refused to make recommendations for public buildings and other expenses of that kind in cases where in the judgment of other other expenses of that kind in cases where in the judgment of other men appropriations should have been recommended by them.

I too feel, as do the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Thornburgh,] that it does not come with a very good grace from my friend from New York, for these has been recommended. after there has been an expenditure of $8,000,000, to be followed by more, amounting probably to $10,000,000, for a single building in the city of New York already so far completed that it is beyond the control of Congress to stop the work—

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The gentleman will allow me to say that that was the very base of my argument against these estimates and this proposition.

Mr. CONGER. And that, I say, is the baseness of the argument.

I enlarge the term. [Laughter.] I say it comes with ill grace from the representative of a people or a State or a city that has been here year after year pleading with this Congress, urging us to make for vast palaces in their midst appropriations of millions and millions of dollars for public buildings there, to oppose little hundred-thousanddollar appropriations that are asked for in the cities of the West and

But this is no new thing. In my experience here I have found that the principal opposition to any appropriation for Government buildings in the West and the South has come as a general thing from those who have demanded for their localities the very largest appropriations, the most costly structures, the most palatial edifices for the accommodation of the officers of the Government.

Sir, I do not wonder that the gentleman from New York should object to the erection of Government buildings in the valley of the Mississippi and on the Mississippi River. Through the liberality of the last Congress, through the plans and devices of engineering genius, we can see already, as the result of the action of a former Congress in endeavoring to open the mouth of that vast artery of communication to the interior of our continent—we can see the day speedily approaching when the largest vessels that sail upon the ocean shall enter the mouth of the Mississippi and shall deliver their freight shan enter the mouth of the Mississipp and shan deriver their region through the whole length of the country watered by that vast channel of internal communication, instead of receiving it through the crowded port of New York, where we have erected those vast buildings. It will be, I trust, but a few short years—I had almost said a few short months—before the plan of constructing jetties to open the mouth of the Mississippi to the commerce of the world shall turn that commerce for all the vast interior States of our country from New York into this great natural artery of American commerce; when we in the interior shall be fed from our own ships, when our when we in the interior shall be fed from our own ships, when our own commerce shall come directly to our own doors. Then New Orleans will need its enlarged public buildings; then Vicksburgh, and Memphis, and Saint Louis, and the other great cities that sleep upon the borders of that majestic stream will demand of this country, and its Representatives will demand of the Government, that buildings shall be erected there appropriate to the renewed business, the accumulated and accumulating commerce which the opening of that channel will bring into the great, imperial valley of the Mississippi. It is in view of such probabilities, (I do not say possibilities,) of such necessary results of the opening of the channels of the Mississippi, that we propose to have buildings necessary now and of vastly greater importance in the near future. And no opposition of these can turn away from that interior empire of the United States its natural business, its natural commerce, and its natural necessary public buildings to do that business.

lie buildings to do that business.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. YOUNG. Other gentlemen of the committee are pressing me to call the previous question and dispose of this bill, so they may have opportunity to submit their reports. I will, however, yield to the genleman from Indiana for five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad this bill has come before the House at this early day, so that the views of the House may be ascertained in regard to how far the old policy of extravagance in the construction of public buildings shall be perpetuated. I admonsh gentlemen that the speeches of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] are of the order of speeches which we have been listening to for years in this House, and the fruits of which have been seen in the swelling of the current, ordinary expenditures of the Government to $180,000,000; that these are the kind of speeches which have floated down the atmosphere of this Hall and this Capitol for a number of years past, resulting in an unbounded extrava-gance which the people of this country are now trying somewhat to

"As wild his thought and gay of wing As Eden's garden bird"—

Now, sir, it is proposed to limit the appropriation under this bill to $400,000, avery large sum of money; but because in a period of unexampled extravagance millions have been appropriated for New York, and Boston, and Chicago, and Saint Louis, and Philadelphia it is proposed that policy shall be perpetuated instead of a check being placed upon it. The gentlemen who make speeches in favor of this extravagance it. The gentlemen who make speeches in favor of this extravagance have generally had for their districts large sums of money appropriated. In the case of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] a great public edifice is being erected requiring the appropriation of large sums of money annually. It is not unnatural that these gentlemen should seek to bring about a state of extravagance, a feeling of recklessness of expenditure, when their constituency demand appropriations to be expended within their own limits.

What has been the practice in regard to appropriations for buildings like this, leaving out of view malatial structures like those of New like this, leaving out of view palatial structures like those of New York, Boston, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Philadelphia? I will take the case of Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, a port of great commercial importance in the northern section of the Union. I find the sum of money expended in the erection of necessary public buildings at Milwaukee was but $229,000.

Mr. YOUNG. What is the place to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. HOLMAN. Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, a place of great commercial importance.

Mr. YOUNG. For what purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was for the purpose of a custom-house and other public buildings in that city, which, as I have stated, cost only $229,000. For the city of Indianapolis, one of the most prosperous of the inland towns of the country, the appropriation was $340,000. For the custom-house, &c., at Louisville, Kentucky, the appropriation was $332,000. It is so throughout the list.

Mr. YOUNG. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that a bill is now pending before that committee upon application from the city of Louisville for an additional appropriation for a court-house in that

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a bill for a different building for a courthouse on account of the inconvenience of the present court-room, but I am not aware that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have deemed it necessary to make any report on that subject to the House. I have mentioned cities of the same class with Memphis in other sections of the country. By my voice and vote I will do the same justice to the South that I will do the North. I have already mentioned what it cost for public buildings in Milwaukee, Louisville, and Indianapolis. I can go through the list, and in each case the expenditure has been less than the sum which I have proposed in the case of Memphis—less than $400,000. I know in view of the enormous appropriations for magnificent buildings in the great commercial cities of the country $400,000 seems to be coming down to a very small amount; but I undertake to say, and I speak with confidence from facts gathered together during the present session of Congress, that an appropriation of $400,000, economically expended and not for mere embellishment of a public edifice but for a building of the simplicity which becomes a republic, will build a solid structure, adapted to all the purposes which the city of Memphis for the next half or quarter of a century may require.

next naif or quarter of a century may require.

This policy of extravagance in this field of expenditure, so grateful to the pride and beneficent to localities, must cease. Can we appropriate another year $8,600,000 as we did last year, and $7,000,000 the year before, for the embellishment of a few cities? Sir, the industry of the country should not be oppressed. Let us construct these buildings, but let us prescribe some reasonable limitation to their cost. The people of the country cannot afford now to construct buildings for all coming time and embellish them as a nation might which had abundant or inexhaustible resources. Let us act in view of the condition of our country and the ability of our people to bear the burdens which we are to impose upon them.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I desire to occupy the time of the House for but a moment or two.

Mr. YOUNG. I must decline to yield, and insist on the previous question. Other gentlemen who have business to bring before the House are pressing me. I cannot yield for a speech, but I will answer any inquiries with pleasure.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I desire to vote intelligently on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the gentleman for an inquiry, not for an

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Well I will put a question. If the views of some gentleman in regard to the great question which now agitates the country be carried out in their ultimate results, what difference would it make to us whether the cost of the public building at Memphis, Tennessee, should be $400,000 or $600,000? If it it is to be paid for by the issue of greenbacks, the cost of it will be merely what it takes to produce them.

Mr. YOUNG. What is the question the gentleman desires to pro-pound?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Allow me to complete my sentence. It will be simply the cost of the paper and the ink, the artistic skill, and the manual labor employed in producing the greenbacks. It will cost a mere bagatelle. Why should we discuss the question of the difference between $400,000 and $600,000?

Mr. YOUNG. I will not undertake to answer all the financial questions.

ions which that gentleman may propound, but will turn him over to the tender mercy of my ally, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley.] But I fear the House may have been misled by this discussion, and I will state briefly what is the pending proposition. discussion, and I will state briefly what is the pending proposition. There is no difference between myself and the gentleman from Indiana, or either of the gentlemen from New York on the question of economy. And there is no difference of opinion as to the necessity or propriety of erecting this building. But by a law enacted at the last Congress it is made necessary that a limit to the expenditure should be fixed before the Secretary of the Treasury will commence the work. The only question now for this House to determine is this: What ought the building at Memphis to cost? I have given you the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and the testimony of the Supervising Architect and notwithstanding that the gentleman from pervising Architect, and, notwithstanding that the gentleman from New York by imputation assails the integrity as well as the judgment of these gentlemen, I am entirely willing myself to risk the following of their opinion as to questions about which I have no information of my own. In addition to their testimony I bring forward the testimony of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, unanimously, except the chairman and one other gentleman, sustaining and corroborating the theory and testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect. Upon their testimony I ask this House not to go into any needless extravagance, not to make an appropriation of a single, solitary dollar, but only to do that which the law requires to be done in order that we may utilize the appropriation already made and now in the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a single moment? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] seemed to imply that the country was not acting justly by the South in regard to these public buildings. My friend must remember that in the last few years we have built at Knoxville, Tennessee, a public building at a cost of $388,000, and that we are now erecting at Nash-building at a cost of $388,000, and that we are now creeting at Nashville, Tennessee, a building that will cost $350,000; so that this is the third building in the space of six years to be erected in Tennessee.

Mr. KELLEY. They used in democratic days to expend millions on such buildings. In Charleston, South Carolina, the unfinished custom-house has cost from five to six million dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman say millions?
Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOLMAN. Before making such statements, the gentleman should look at the records of history.

Mr. KELLEY. I do say that the unfinished custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina, has cost many millions of dollars.

Mr. YOUNG. The question which the gentleman from Indiana seemed to indicate in his concluding remarks was whether a custom-house at Memphis should be built at all or not. We are not considering that question. If that were presented to the House for their consideration, whether a custom-house should be built at Memphis at all, it might be proper to remind the House that one public building has been erected at Knoxville and that one is now being built at Nashville; but there is already a law enacted by Congress in 1873 which declares that a custom-house should be constructed in the city which declares that a custom-house should be constructed in the city of Memphis, and an appropriation was made. The law declared that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect should at once prepare plans and specifications and proceed with the work; and the only difficulty in the way was the enactment of that law of 1874, which the Secretary of the Treasury construes to trammel him in the construction of this building until the limit should be fixed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore. DEATH OF HON. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires now to say to the House that he was notified early this morning by the friends of the late Mr. STARKWEATHER, of Connecticut, that it was their desire at three o'clock to proceed in the House to pay the proper respect to the memory of Mr. Starkweather. That hour is now passed, and twenty minutes more. What is it the pleasure of the House now to do?

Mr. PHELPS. I wish the House now to listen to the resolutions of respect to Mr. Starkweather's memory which I send to the Clerk's desk,

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, late a member of this House from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to the memory of the deceased the officers and members of the House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be forthwith transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, it has again become the sad duty of the Representatives of the State of Connecticut to announce the decease of one of their colleagues in the councils of the nation. The shafts of death have recently fallen with such rapidity upon the distinguished citizens of the Republic that even the eloquence of eulogy has become commonplace in these halls, and it is difficult without repetition to select language suitable for the expression of our feelings. But a few days since we were required to suspend the prosecution of our ordinary official duties and pay the customary tribute of respect to the memory of one who at the time of his decease was in the enjoyment of the highest honor which a State of this Union can bestow on its most deserving citizen. Now, sir, it is not a Senator who has fallen but one of our own members, an honored member of this House, who possessed the respect of us all, and the friendship of many of the oldest and most prominent members of this body.

Hon. Henry H. Starkweather died at his lodgings in this city on the morning of the 28th of January last. His recent invocation in behalf of another to "come quickly" was speedily answered to himself, and his spirit has been borne to the presence of Him who

He was born of highly respectable parents, in the town of Preston, Connecticut, on the 29th day of April, 1826. His father was in moderate pecuniary circumstances, and followed the plain but reputable pursuit of agriculture, and his son until twenty-one years of age, when not attending the common schools or teaching in them, assisted his father in his work upon the farm. With such opportunities for education as he possessed, and with a strong desire for learning and a natural intellect of a superior order, he acquired a thorough common education, and by much and well-selected reading stored his mind with useful information which a vigorous and well-trained memory enabled him to retain. In that way he acquired a fund of valuable knowledge from which, as occasion required, he drew in after-life, and made available in all the exigencies of his professional and political cargor. and political career.

His ambition for distinction led him to adopt the profession of the law, for which he qualified under the instruction of an eminent and accomplished lawyer, now one of the judges of the supreme court of the State, and was admitted to the bar in 1850. He immediately commenced practice in the city of Norwich, and at a bar which numbered among its members some of the most able and distinguished practitioners in the State occupied a respectable position. Like many other young and promising members of his profession, he allowed himself to be withdrawn from exclusive devotion to it by the excitement of politics, and after a short practice of ten years, during which he had been steadily rising toward distinction, he accepted the appointment of postmaster in that city, and from that time gave little attention to his profession.

In politics he was a whig until the disintegration of that party, and then actively assisted in the organization of the American party, by which he was elected to the lower house in the State Legislature in He afterward aided with enthusiasm in the formation of the republican party, was prominent in its councils, and was a delegate to the national conventions which nominated Mr. Lincoln in 1860 and General Grant in 1868. He was re-appointed postmaster in 1865 by President Johnson; but after the latter made his celebrated speech on the 22d of February, 1866, he could not longer consistently retain of-fice under his administration, and resigned.

He was nominated and elected to Congress in 1867, and by succes-sive re-elections continued to occupy a seat here until his death. The period embraced in his congressional service was one of the most interesting in the history of the country, and during that period he at different times held positions on several of the most important committees of the House, and was remarkable for the faithfulness with which he constantly endeavored to perform his duty. No request from a constituent, however humble, was disregarded by him, and his known fidelity to duty and his conscientious adherence to principle were what most especially constituted the elements of his strength. He was quiet and unassuming in his official demeanor, and seldom attempted to participate in debate beyond the formal statements attempted to participate in debate beyond the formal statements which were necessary to explain the reports from committees which he had occasion to make; but he had, notwithstanding, acquired an influence from his long membership and his familiarity with the rules of congressional proceedings which any member, however long in service, may be satisfied to attain. That made him a very valuable and efficient Representative and enabled him to acquire a usefulness which no inexperienced member, however able, can hope to possess. His congressional career is familiar to many now here who have been long associated with him and to them I leave the friendly office of more associated with him, and to them I leave the friendly office of more ably and particularly illustrating it.

He possessed an uncommon natural power in another respect. He had a remarkably accurate judgment of men, and an almost intuitive perception of their character. This added much to his capacity and influence as a legislator, and was a material and valuable constituent in the composition of the man.

He also possessed great force of will, and bravely struggled against the disease which overcame him. He had successfully passed through previous severe attacks of illness and doubted not he should escape fatal consequences from the last. Through fear of accasioning his fatal consequences from the last. Through fear of occasioning his family unnecessary apprehension he refused to allow them to be in-formed of the severity of his suffering, and as late as the afternoon before his death addressed with his own hand, which betrayed no sign of weakness, a few affectionate and encouraging words to his wife, who, unknown to him, was then hastening in feeble health, but with true wifely instinct and devotion, to administer to him the comfort of her care and the consolation of her companionship. She arrived in season to receive an intelligent and affectionate recognition from him, and a few moments after he passed from life as gently as the twilight fades into the night. He has gone in the pride of his intellectual strength, before the frosts of age had silvered his locks or the hand of time furrowed his brow; gone in the midst of his use-or the hand of time furrowed his brow; gone in the midst of his usefulness, when his services were more than ever valuable and needed. There was another prominent element in his character, too rarely found in the statesmen of the present day, which cannot be omitted without doing him great injustice and rendering the portraiture of his life very incomplete. He was a devoted Christian. Disease assailed him at his post of duty and soon conquered his weak frame; but the invitation from his Master did not find him unprepared; "he knew in whom he trusted." He had in early life clothed himself with the armor of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and that shield and helmet and breast-plate which were the panophy of his defense against. helmet and breast-plate which were the panoply of his defense against the assaults of the enemy of all righteousness were worn by him in triumph to the end. At his obsequies the overflowing church and thronged streets, the saddened countenances and tearful eyes spoke eloquently of the universal respect and grief of the community who had known him longest and best. The benedictions of a bereaved people were reverently breathed upon his casket.

Death is under all circumstances a solemn event and can scarcely occur to the humblest and most obscure without inflicting torture on other hearts; and while it is true that the sorrow of such is sometimes more deep and lasting than that of those who move in a higher sphere, yet the public are not shocked. But when a citizen whose position and services have made his name familiar is stricken down in the conflict of life with his official armor on, the electric announcement which theils throughout the country produces a servertion of ment which thrills throughout the country produces a sensation of public calamity and loss, a feeling that a public servant has fallen, the loss of whose experience and service is a public bereavement.

It is a singular fact that the last public act of Senator Ferry was to pronounce a eulogy upon his colleague, Senator Buckingham. It is a more singular circumstance that Mr. Starkweather's last official work was the preparation of a similar address upon Senator Ferry. It is yet more singular that before that address was delivered he had been suddenly summoned from this world, and that paper was read to this House in the place of a eulogy of his own by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [General Garrield.] I will leave to others who have finer imagination and more fervid speech to paint with glowing words the beauty of the closing part of that address and to tell how descriptive it was of his own feelings and condition, how personally descriptive it was of his own feelings and condition, how personally prophetic in its application, and how truly it sounded like the triumphant strains of the dying Christian singing his own requiem.

In private life Mr. Starkweather was above reproach, modest and unaffected in his manner, amiable in his disposition, genial and social in his intercourse, generous to his friends, charitable to the poor, just to all. He was deeply devoted to those who composed his cherished household circle and equally beloved by them.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention rather to listen than to take part in these solemn ceremonies. But at the request of my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. Phelps,] I desire in brief words to add my tribute of respect to the memory of him whose loss we deplore.

My acquaintance with Mr. Starkweather began at the opening of the present session of Congress. From the first he impressed me as a gentleman of a high order of ability, laborious in the discharge of every duty, and faithful to every trust. A continuous service in this House for more than eight years fully attests the value placed upon his services by the people whom he represented. The record of the proceedings of this body will show that he played no unimportant part in the discussion and adjustment of the great questions of public policy which have agitated the country during the last decade of years. Wrong he may at times have been in his conclusions, but that those conclusions were the result of intelligent deliberation and conscientious conviction no one who knew him could doubt. But, sir, it is not for me to speak more fully of his public services. Others who have known him longer and have been his co-laborers here have performed that duty.

Mr. Speaker, the sad duty devolved upon myself with others of this House, under your appointment, to bear the remains of our late associate back to his native State, to his home and people, and there consign them to their last resting-place. The sad yet pleasing recollections of that service can never be effaced from my memory. If I had doubted that service can never be effaced from my memory. If I had doubted the strong hold that this Representative had upon the hearts of his people, such doubts would have been dispelled by the symbols of grief, the evidences of true sorrow we everywhere beheld. For one day all business was suspended, public buildings and many private residences draped in mourning, while the countenances of the many thousands who followed him to the silent grave bore unmistakable evidences of deep and lecting sorrow. deep and lasting sorrow.

Mr. Speaker, our late associate has played his part in this little drama of human life, and the record of his deeds here is forever closed. The places that have known him upon the earth can know him no more forever. In a beautiful New England city, surrounded by the eternal hills, among a people who so long honored themselves by hon-

He sleeps his last sleep, and No sound can awake him to glory again.

Mr. Speaker, we mourn him as a trusted associate, as a faithful public servant, but what must be the bereavement of those to whom he sustained the more endearing relation of husband and father? Within that vale of sacred grief we would not enter; but "may He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" soothe and sustain the bereaved in this trying hour.

Sir, as we pause for a brief moment from the cares and duties that press upon us to pay this last tribute of respect to the memory of our departed friend; it is a pleasing thought that, to the character of faithful Representative, exemplary citizen, and devoted husband and father, he added that of a humble, devout Christian. The dread summons which came to him, and which we know not how soon must come to us all, found him calmly, resolutely awaiting its approach.

Mr. Speaker, almost the last act of Mr. Starkweather's life was the preparation of the beautiful and touching eulogium upon Senator FERRY which he did not live to utter, but which was so impressively read to this House but a few days since by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. Garfield.] Sir, I know of no more fitting language with which to close these remarks than those prophetic words with which he closed his tribute to the memory of the dead Senator from his own

It was most beautiful and grand, a mid failing strength and long years of pain, to hear him discourse of —  $\,$

Rest at last, Repose complete, eternal; Love, rest, and home.

No cloud obscured the effulgence of his hope or dimmed his vision. Clear and high his intellect and his faith rose above all storms and darkness, and sustained him in sweet companionship amid the unrevealed mysteries of pain.

Thinking of trials past, and knowing as we do how well he had wrought for the future, trusting in the merits of his dear Lord, he could repeat the sweet lines of Bonar—

Beyond the parting and the meeting I shall be soon;
Beyond the farewell and the greeting,
Beyond this pulse's fever beating,
I shall be soon.
Love, rest, and home!
Sweet hope!
Lord, tarry not, but come.

Beyond the frost-chain and the fever, I shall be soon;
Beyond the rock waste and the river, Beyond the ever and the never, I shall be soon.

Love, rest, and home!
Sweet hope!
Lord, tarry not, but come.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, from the day when I first entered this House, seven years ago, the deceased member and I have been thrown much together. We both served upon the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-first Congress, and during all the arduous labors of the Committee on Appropriations for the Forty-third Congress we sat at the same table, engaged in the same work. Still later, (and this recollection summons his face before me in clear relief,) he sat next on my right in the chair which is to-day vacant; and so it came about that I knew him well—were it not for that fine reserve which was a feature of his character, I should say intimately.

Like other gentlemen who have served with him on committees, I learned to value Mr. Starkweather for the faithful services that he brought to every duty laid upon him and for the clear judgment that he displayed in oftentimes conflicting national, sectional, and political interests. Through it all he was honest and earnest of purpose, and, though by no means an aggressive man in temper, he was effective and spirited in maintaining his views, and, if ever assailed in any manner reflecting on the consistency of his political course, he always showed that he was amply capable of taking care of himself.

He has left this presence where not a few still remain who have served with him, and among them all I venture to say there is not one who does not feel that he was honest, capable, and faithful.

His constituents appreciated this high character, and manifested their appreciation by repeated returns. It is no common thing either in Connecticut or in any State for a member of this House to be returned here at five successive elections. Few higher honors ever fall upon an American citizen. From some acquaintance with his constituents I have been impressed with the belief that their confidence in him has been for ten years a growing and not a waning sentiment.

Like many of our public men, Mr. Starkweather gave his best years to the service of his country, and died a poor man; but he has left to his dear wife and children that precious legacy a good name and the memory of a well-spent life.

Upon this floor we have all seen him, attentive and watchful; in the committee-rooms of this Capitol, where is molded the legislation of forty millions of people, some of us have sat by him and have been benefited by his counsels.

The years of his public service have come and have gone. They failed not with him, as they fail not with most of us, to deepen the unseen burdens of mortality and to sap the strength with which we resist the common decay. But out of it all Mr. STARKWEATHER resist the common decay. But out of it all Mr. STARKWEATHER brought none or little of the accumulations for which many men in other walks barter health, honor, and life.

He was content to do well his duty, and the recollection of his patient life and the protection of a kind Creator and Father will, I know, raise up friends for those who were dependent upon him and who are well-nigh heart-broken at his loss.

Listening the other day to the deep and fervent words which he had written for an occasion like this, in memory of his deceased friend, the late Senator from Connecticut, in which in rapt language he prefigured the soul's relation to the illimitable future, and also looking back, as I now do, to the incidents and observations of every-day life, which are apt to elude us until after our friends are taken from us, I am impressed with the belief that Mr. Starkweather carried with him, as a constant presence, the conviction that death might at any time come to him. He was never, or at least not for years, what might be called a well man. Lassitude, weakness, illness, all conspired to drag him down. Against these he always made an uncomplaining and manly resistance, and notwithstanding them wrought out a life of useful deeds such as few men ever compas

But, Mr. Speaker, what struggles and misgivings the watches of the night, could they be laid bare, might show to us we can never know. There are no such heroic combats as these silent, solitary ones with the relentless foe that at last occupies all human fields. ordinary conflicts of human life sink into littleness beside them. To know that the destroyer has made his lodgment, and that, whatsoever may be the tie that binds us to life, the allurements of public station, the charm of love and friendship, the laughter and confidence of little children, he will yet give us but little notice, is what with most men breaks down courage and palsies every effort. Thinking of such a conflict, and believing as I do that our friend waged it, I recall the words of Thackeray upon another of life's lost battles:

The thought of it smites me down in humble submission before the Ruler of kings and men, the Monarch Supreme, the inscrutable Dispenser of life, death, happiness, victory.

He who has left us was no recreant here. He succumbed only when the hand could be no more upraised and the asserting will failed forever. But he has left with us the memory of the cheerful companion, the good friend, the honest, faithful public servant.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in some respects this Hall is the coldest, the most isolated place in which the human heart can find a temporary residence. We are in the service of distant constituencies, each of us representing the wishes and aspirations of separate communities, people with whom we are far more closely connected than with each other. Few of us have been neighbors, or even acquaintances. We are here not for each other, but for the public; and the duties of our temporary sojourn are such as necessarily to keep us isolated from each other. I have often been saddened with the thought that in no place where my life has been cast bave I seen so much necessary isolation as here. True, our work brings us together every day; we see each other's faces; we compare opinions upon public questions; we divide, combine, clash, agree, attack, and defend; but, after all, this life is a wonderful isolation. The accidents of committhe service, of the seats we may occupy in this Hall, of the places in the city where we may reside—all these frequently determine whether we shall really know much or little of each other. And usually it is difficult without the favorable concurrence of these accidents for two busy members of this House to become very intimately acquainted with each other.

Mr. Starkweather was a member of this House several years before I could say that I had any intimate acquaintance with him. It was only when our duties brought us together upon the same committee that I came to realize how much I had lost in the four years during which he had been a member of this body. Our service together on a very laborious committee gave me unusual opportunities to study the character of his mind and heart, and to know that, in the best meaning of the words, he was a true, genuine, manly man. Foremost among his high qualities was his unselfishness. He was one of the few men we meet in this ambitious tussle of public life who are willing to take up a difficult and tangled subject, patiently work it out, and put his results into the common fund of work as cheerfully and faithfully as if the duties and the honors were all his own. Without complaining, quietly, patiently, and faithfully he did his work, finding his reward in the consciousness of duty well done.

There was another circumstance that enabled us to know more of his character than would otherwise have been possible. I have somehis character than would otherwise have been possible. I have sometimes thought that we cannot know any man thoroughly well while he is in perfect health. As the ebb-tide discloses the real lines of the shore and bed of the sea, so feebleness, sickness, and pain bring out the real character of a man. Who knew better than he the sacred ministry of pain? Who fought more bravely for life? Who struggled more courageously to do his duty uncomplainingly and appear to be well? I have seen him in the committee-room in such paroxysms of coughing that it seemed he must die in his chair. Yet, with a rare homefulness and courage that rejected help, he waved his friends off or coughing that it seemed he must die in his chair. Let, with a rare hopefulness and courage that rejected help, he waved his friends off as if annoyed that they should notice his weakness. Thus, for years, he pushed away the hand that was reaching for his heart-strings, and bravely worked on until his last hour. I do not doubt that his will and cheerful courage prolonged his life many years.

He was a man of uncommon soundness of judgment, of rare common sense. I recently heard one of our foremost scholars and thinkers say that of all the men who had made the most enduring impress upon the character and history of our institutions, the men of sound judgment had done vastly more for us than all our brilliant men had accomplished. He noticed especially the example of Washington.

Hamilton was the master of a brilliant style, clear and bold in conception and decisive in execution; Jefferson was profoundly imbued ception and decisive in execution; Jefferson was profoundly imbued with a philosophic spirit, could formulate the aspirations of a brave and free people in all the graces of powerful rhetoric; and other master-minds of that period added their great and valuable contributions to the common stock; but, whether in the camp or in the cabinet, the quality that rose above all the other great gifts of that period was the comprehensive and unerring judgment of Washington. It was that all-embracing sense, that calmness of solid judgment, that made him easily chief; not only the first man of his age, but foremost "in the foremost files of time"

most "in the foremost files of time."

I was deeply impressed with this tribute to the value of sound judgment, of saving common sense, as contrasted with the more flashing qualities of genius. And I may say that our departed friend was girded with a calm, balanced judgment that made him a man to be trusted in moments of doubt and difficulty. I have known but few men who knew so perfectly the drift and current of public thought and of what would be just right and fitting and wise to do. It was this which made Mr. Starkweather so valuable a member of the committees on which he served. They found him never fickle, always wise, never extreme, always steady, having the courage of his opinions and always ready to defend them.

He had one experience that almost every man must have before his character can be fully tested. He was tried in the fiery furnace of detraction and abuse. I remember well, in that period of assault, how calmly, how modestly, and yet how bravely he bore himself—without bitterness, without shrinking—boldly meeting all assaults, calmly answering, bearing himself through the storm like a genuine man as he was. That was the test which set the seal of character and gave assurance that he was made of the real stuff of which genine heroic men are made. nine, heroic men are made.

But, after all, we have but small ground to judge of a man's real merits here. We can judge of many qualities; but if we would know a man's heart and learn how the foundations of his character have been laid, we must enter that circle where he has been known from his youth and in which his life has been developed. Well as I knew STARKWEATHER, I confess that I never knew until we bore his body back to his home and saw his neighbors gathered around his bier how true, how tender, and how noble a soul was his.

We know but little of each other here. Behind this public life lies a world of history, of quiet, beautiful, home-life, within which the religious opinions and sentiments are manifested—a world of affecting the feature of which are not be beautiful. tion, the features of which are rarely brought out in this forum. Who of us knew the deep, the profound religious life of our departed friend? None of us ever saw anything in him inconsistent with the highest religious character; but who of us had learned that at home, in the circle of his family and his church, he was a steady, clear light, illuminating the whole circle in which he moved, and filling with the radiance of a sweet and beautiful religious life the hearts of all who knew him. On the evening of his very last day at home, only a month before he came here to die, he spoke in his own church, in a quiet social gathering, such words as we found were echoing and trembling in the stricken hearts of those who came to follow his bier.

There was no religious cant in this man-no ostentatious parade of piety. It was with him, as he said of Senator Ferry, not a sentiment merely, but a controlling force, that lighted his pathway and molded his whole life. And it was this that bowed my soul in reverence and love as I stood beside his grave. I believe we may say in every good sense of the word that his life has been a noble and worthy success, a life that we ought to remember for our own sakes and for the sake of our country, a life that those who knew him can never forget.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byrow Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read. CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I perceive by the reading of the Journal it is said that I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, asking to be discharged from the petition of S. D. Lee. My report was asking to be discharged from certain papers relating to the removal of his disabilities, because the papers were not a petition, as they were thought to have been when they were presented by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] They are indorsed in that way, but the difficulty was that they were not a petition. I would like to have the Journal corrected accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made. HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1719) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MEDAL TO MRS. KETURAH J. NASH.

The joint resolution (H. R. No.73) authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to present the medal made for William H. H. Nash to his widow, Keturah J. Nash, was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that this joint resolution may be put on its passage. I am sure there will be no objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it about?

Mr. ANTHONY. In 1872 the steamer Metis was destroyed in Long Island Sound, and very brave and heroic deeds were performed by certain the steamer Metis was destroyed. tain citizens in rescuing the lives of the passengers. For that service Congress decreed medals to those brave men. One of them has died, and the Secretary of State does not feel authorized under the law to deliver the medal to his family. This resolution merely provides that the medal may be given to his widow.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the President to present the medal made by authority of Congress by joint resolution approved February 24, 1873, for William H. H. Nash, for gallant services, in connection with others, in saving the lives of thirty-two persons from the wreck of the steamer Metis, from the waters of Long Island Sound, on the 31st day of August, 1872, to his surviving widow, Mrs. Keturah J. Nash.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EULOGIES ON VICE-PRESIDENT WILSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Vice-President, Henry Wilson, be printed; 9,000 copies for the use of the House and 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Wilson to accompany the same.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR ANDREW JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Andrew Johnson, late Senator and Ex-President of the United States, be printed; 9,000 for the use of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Johnson to accompany the same.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, against the granting of subsidies to the Texas Pacific Railroad, and for other internal improvements. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be reported. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolutions relative to the granting of subsidies by Congress in aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad and other internal improvements.

the Texas Pacific Railroad and other internal improvements.

Whereas it appears that applications for the aid of the National Government in the form of money, credit, bonds, or indorsements of bonds of private corporations are now pending in the Congress of the United States to an amount exceeding $600,000,000, for the purpose of promoting schemes of canals, railroads, or other internal improvements, the value and utility of which are at least doubtful, and which are not demanded for present commercial, military, or national reasons; and whereas it also appears that important committees of the said Congress are now seriously considering the propriety of recommending the appropriate legislation whereby the United States will be committed to a gnarantee or indorsement of the interest payments upon the bonds or promissory obligations of certain railroad corporations, amounting in the aggregate to about $250,000,000 in gold, for the pupose of constructing a railroad line from Northeastern Texas to the Pacific Ocean, near the thirty-second parallel of latitude, with numerous branches thereof, amounting to over three thousand miles, and that this encouragement given to this class of proposals tends constantly to swell the number and extent of such applications and is giving rise to many schemes of like questionable character which have failed to secure the approval of private capitalists, and which, by their combined influence and support, embarrass, retard, and interfere with the proper subjects of legislation:

bined influence and support, embarrass, retard, and interfere with the proper subjects of legislation:

Be it resolved, (if the assembly concur.) That it is unwise, impolitic, and dangerous at this time of depressed trade and heavy financial burdens for Congress to embark the country upon such gigantic works, and thereby invite other and further demands for national assistance to the detriment of the people and good government; and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper influences to counteract and defeat such attempts; and that the secretary of state be instructed to forward, without delay, a copy hereof to each of them.

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE, February 15, 1876.

I wish to state that I do not concur in the object of the memorialists. I move the reference of the memorials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1873.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution from the House of Representa-tives stating that there are 10,000 copies of the Agricultural Report of 1873 undistributed, and providing that the Commissioner of Agricul-ture distribute to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives twenty-five copies, have considered that resolution, and do not recognize that mode of distribution per capita; but suggest an amendment which produces nearly the same result. I believe that it is usual in the distribution of documents that the Senate shall have from one-third to a quarter as many as the other House, except this particular volume of Agricultural Reports, in which case I think the distribution is more nearly per capita. I have offered an amendment distribution is more nearly per capita. I have offered an amendment to the resolution which produces nearly the same result without recognizing that mode of distribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks the present consideration of the resolution which will be read, sub-

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution as proposed to be amended by the committee reads:

Whereas, from information derived from the Commissioner of Agriculture, there is about ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1873 undis-are about ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1813 undistributed: Therefore,

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

AMENDMENT OF FUNDING ACT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 478.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (8. No. 478) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, and of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved January 20, 1871, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the acts to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, so that the amount of bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest authorized to be issued be increased to $500 000 000 and be interest authorized to be issued be increased to $500,000,000 and be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, instead of after fifteen years. This is not to be construed to authorize any increase of the total amount of bonds provided for by the acts to which this is an amendment, nor to authorize any increase whatever of the bonded debt of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I ought to explain the exact changes made in the existing law. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, and is pressed upon us now for immediate consideration as time becomes important. The first section of the act of July 14, 1870, commonly called the refunding act, provides for three classes of bonds. After providing for a certain amount of 5 per cent. bonds, the second clause reads as follows:

Also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000, of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States, after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent.

And then it provides a further issue of 4 per cent. bonds. The only effect of this bill is to change the 4½ per cent. bonds from fifteen-year bonds to thirty-year bonds, and to increase the amount from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000. These are the only changes proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask has any part of these bonds under existing the proposed of the second of Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask has any part of chest solds is ting law been issued?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir, not at all. I may state what is probably known to every Senator that the process of funding 5 per cent. bonds is exhausted, as now authorized by law. The Secretary believes now if this bill be passed promptly he would commence the process of refunding 6 per cent. bonds to 4½ per cent. bonds. Time is essential, inasmuch as in the spring of the year and this season of the year is a better time to fund than later when money becomes more active. I better time to fund than later when money becomes more active. I take it there will be no objection to the passage of the bill, because such an arrangement as that will save us 1½ per cent. on all the bonds funded, and if the amount proposed is taken there will be a saving of 1½ per cent. on $500,000,000, or seven and one-half million dol!ars

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance how many 6 per cent. bonds are now in existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. Something over a thousand millions. state precisely, but any one can tell by looking at the tables.

I thought probably the Senator could approximate Mr. DAVIS. the number.

Mr. SHERMAN. Over a thousand millions. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] may be able to tell the Senator exactly.

I could state by looking at the tables.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Senator from Ohio what is the necessity of increasing the amount of 41 per cent. bonds from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 if none of the 41 per cent. bonds have yet been placed in the market? I can see the necessity of this act so far as changing the time from fifteen years to thirty years is concerned; but why change the amount from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 before the experiment has been tried upon the $300,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason of that is simply this: It is manifestly our interest to have $500,000,000 sold at this rate if we can, and we ought before we commence issuing these bonds to fix the amount, because if we issue $300,000,000 now, after the $300,000,000 are taken it might be doubtful whether we ought to increase the amount. It is believed now that $500,000,000 can be negotiated. The basis of the loan ought to be settled before we commence the loan, so that people who deal with us may know precisely the amount. The Secretary asks it, and I see no reason why we should not grant it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like, before voting on this bill, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if there is no probability that bonds can be negotiated at 4 per cent., because, if they can be negotiated at a lower rate of interest, I see no necessity for increasing I should like, the amount of bonds to be negotiated at 4½ per cent. I should like, therefore, to ask the chairman of the committee whether 4 per cent.

bonds could be negotiated?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. None of these bonds can be negotiated at less than par in gold. It would be absolutely impossible now in the state of the money market to negotiate 4 per cent. bonds at that rate. I hope the advance of the credit of the Government may enable us to negotiate 4 per cent. bonds at some time, but now it cannot be done;

it is utterly impossible, and would be idle to attempt it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not understand that it will ever be done if a disposition is manifested on the part of the United States to increase the amount of bonds that are to be negotiated at 4½ per cent. If, however, the Government of the United States would once make it known to capitalists throughout the world that the rate of interest payable upon the bonds of the United States hereafter to be funded is to be 4 per cent., I apprehend we might possibly have our bonds taken at that rate of interest. It seems to me that such legislation as this tends to defeat the very object which we meant to attain in providing for the funding of bonds at 4 per cent. While a disposition is manifested on the part of the Government to fund bonds at a higher rate of interest, as a matter of course the 4 year cent bonds. higher rate of interest, as a matter of course the 4 per cent. bonds will not be taken and the 6 per cents funded in them. I therefore doubt very much the policy at the present time of advertising the world that we intend to increase the number of bonds to be negotiated at 4½ per cent. When the 4½ per cent. bonds already provided for are exhausted, let us fall back to the lowest minimum rate of interest, 4 per cent., and I have not much doubt that when capitalists become convinced that the determination of this Government is to pay no higher rate of interest, capital in Europe, and probably in this country, will seek investment at that rate of interest. I doubt very much the propriety of the policy of continually increasing the amount to be funded at a higher rate of interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, my friend falls into the error of supposing that we have ever yet been able to sell our 4½ per cent. bonds at par in coin. We never have. None have been issued. No 4½ per cent. bond has ever been issued by the Government. We never could sell them. Indeed we have only recently succeeded, after a five years' trial, in selling $500,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds. Now the money market is very favorable; investment securities are higher money market is very favorable; investment securities are higher than ever before in this country, or perhaps in any country. People do not care about embarking in new and speculative enterprises. The money market is favorable to the negotiation of bonds at a low rate of interest, and the Secretary of the Treasury now believes that he can sell 4½ per cent. bonds; but before selling any, the amount that the Government is willing to issue ought to be fixed so that it hell not hereafter be increased to the injury of these who have the that the Government is willing to issue ought to be fixed so that it shall not hereafter be increased to the injury of those who buy the first bonds. There will be three classes of bonds issued under it if the refunding act takes full effect, as I have no doubt it will: $500,-000,000 of 5 per cents; $500,000,000 of 4½ per cents; and $500,000,000 of 4 per cents. We have never yet been able to sell our 4½ per cent. bonds. The Secretary thinks he can sell them now, and we ought to say Godspeed to him because every operation under this law must be for the benefit of the Government. If he sells a million of dollars he saves much per cent in each interest anymally on the million of dol saves us 14 per cent, in gold interest annually on the million of dollars that he thus issues.

As a matter of course, it is a question for the Senate whether they will now authorize the increase of the 4½ per cents from three hundred to five hundred millions. I have no doubt of the propriety of it myself; but if the Senator from Delaware wishes to contest that point, he can move to strike out the clause in regard to increasing the

My attention has been called to a typographical error by the Senator from Massachusetts. The word "of" in the eighth line ought to be left out and "millions" changed to "million;" it ought to read "five hundred million dollars;" not "five hundred millions of dollars."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether there is a commission for the sale of the bonds in any way by the Secretary of the Treasury; whether there is any discretion as to commissions, or whether he must sell them at par without a com-

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the funding act of 1870 the commission is regulated and defined. All the expenses must be included within ½ of 1 per cent. The whole process will be continued under the old law. Mr. DAVIS. This bill makes no change in that respect?

Mr. SHERMAN. None at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether it is the opinion of his committee and that of the finance officer of the Government that a fifty-year bond at 4 per cent. could not be sold at par in gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state that the Committee on Finance, as far as I know, were unanimously of opinion that this bill ought to pass. As to whether a fifty-year 4 per cent. bond should be issued, I doubt very much whether the Government ought ever to issue a bond having fifty years to run. I believe the whole of the public debt can be paid before that time. But that is not the question before us. This is simply an amendment of an existing law, which provides for a 4½ per cent. bond, and provides the mode and manner in which it shall All we do is to lengthen the time it has to run, so as to induce capitalists to buy it, from fifteen to thirty years, and to increase the amount so that we may give notice to all the world that we will avail ourselves of the right to sell five hundred instead of we will avail ourselves of the right to sell live hundred instead of three hundred million. If we were to go to work and offer to sell $300,000,000, we might be bound by that limit. It might seem fair then, to sell only $300,000,000 of such bonds, and then to fall back on the 4 per cent. bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to one point that I think ought to be provided for in this bill. Onlo to one point that I think ought to be provided for in this bill. I think this loan ought to be exempted from the provisions of the sinking fund. I do not know whether that question has been considered by the Senator from Ohio or not. This bill provides for a bond payable in thirty years. Under the operation of the sinking fund, as it now stands, the public debt will be paid off in twenty-three years. It seems to me that this loan, whatever it is, should be exempted from the provisions of the sinking fund, taken out of the provisions of the sinking-fund law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we cannot borrow the money.
Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any doubt that we can.
Mr. SHERMAN. My answer is that the passage of this bill will Mr. SHERMAN. My answer is that the passage of this bill will not prevent us regulating our sinking fund as far as we can properly do so; and we ought not to introduce that foreign matter on this bill. It would make a distinction which capitalists and others might not understand. The better way is to make a law of this kind as simple understand. The better way is to make a law of this kind as simple as possible. When you talk about the sinking fund and separate this loan from the general operations of the sinking-fund law, you will only embarrass the sale of the bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. The operations of the existing sinking fund will by a spirit of the entire public debt in twenty-three years. Here we issue bonds payable in thirty years. We are compelled therefore either to redeem this bond or to buy it within the twenty-three years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the Senator from Iowa would guarantee the full operation of the sinking fund for all the twenty-three years.

Then we might talk about it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Ohio say that we can do as we choose with the sinking fund. It has been claimed hitherto that we could not; that the sinking fund was an obligation to our creditors that we could not interfere with. What I desired was to know of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether we cannot give notice to the purchasers of these bonds that whether we cannot give notice to the purchasers of these bonds that they are not to be within the provisions of the sinking fund. I am very sure they would purchase these bonds more readily if they knew that they would run absolutely for thirty years and would not be purchased within fifteen or twenty or twenty-five years, as provided by the sinking fund. The length of time contributes to the value of a bond.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa does not suppose that we have a right under the sinking-fund law to go and take these bonds and pay them when we choose. We should only have to buy them in the market, and if they were above par we should have to pay the market price.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERMAN. We could not have any advantage in buying

Mr. SHERMAN. We could not have any advantage in buying

Mr. SHERMAN. We could not have any advantage in buying

Mr. SHEKMAN. We could not have any advantage in buying bonds for the sinking fund over any other purchaser.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore these bonds after the others were purchased, assuming that they would be, would of course go above par if they had to be purchased for the sinking fund. There may be nothing in this, but I think there is something in the suggestion.

Mr. McDONALD. I can see a very good reason for extending the time during which these bonds are to run, as that will probably enalize the state of the suggestion.

ble the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate them where he cannot with the present limit. But I am not satisfied that there is any necessity for extending the quantity of this class of bonds. It seems to me that when he has made the effort, and it is found that a larger quantity can be negotiated than the law at present provides for of this class, it will be time enough for us to enlarge the amount by taking from the class at a lower rate of interest. Therefore I feel inclined to oppose that part of this bill which proposes to enlarge the number of 4½ per cent. bonds to be issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that the Senator from Ohio has stated that we can do what we like with the provisions of the law relating to what is called the sinking fund, for I believe that the public faith is just as much pledged to the present holders of the bonds of the United States to adhere to what is called the sinking-fund law as the public faith can be pledged to anything whatever. If any for-eign country, like Mexico, for instance, that we thought we were strong enough to deal with according to our own sense of justice, should, in dealing with our citizens, have her revenues pledged in a certain way to their payment, and should then violate the pledge, and change her laws so that the creditors could not get their pay, we should go to war about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am afraid that my friend from Vermont understood me to say that we could repeal the sinking fund or the obliga-tion of the sinking fund. I did not say any such thing, or if I did, I did not express myself fully. The Senator from Massachusetts tells me that my language might be construed in that way. What I meant was this: I regard the sinking fund, and I have always insisted that the sinking fund is part of the contract, and we cannot change or vary from it; but so far as we can regulate the sinking fund, we may change the mode and manner of keeping it, or even direct the funds which shall be purchased for the sinking fund, or say whether currency may not be bought for the sinking fund. All these things are proper for the discretion of Congress; but the obligation of the United States to redeem 1 per cent. of its bonded indebtedness each year is imperative. I do not wish to be misunderstood on that vital point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to hear the present remarks of the Senator from Ohio. They are much more in favor of the public credit in getting off our 4½ per cent bonds than his previous remarks would have been understood to be without the correction; but there is one observation which he has suffered to fall from his lips, which, if I correctly understood it, I must still disagree to. He says we may regulate the currency of the sinking fund, or some words of that kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. The United States notes are a part of the debt of the United States; we may buy them up, and hold them as part of the sinking fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to that; and I am glad to know that is

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to that; and I am glad to know that is what my friend meant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am glad to hear it in the event that at any time there should be any importance in the observation of the Senator from Iowa. We undoubtedly in making this new loan have a right to say that the new loan shall not fall within the operations of the inclining fund but that it shall be taken werely a the governed profile. sinking fund, but that it shall be taken merely on the general credit of the United States. If we do so, then no creditor has a right to com-plain; but the amount of the public debt in respect to which the sinking fund is an obligation of good faith is by so much diminished, and this loan is entirely free from it. If, on the other hand, we issue these bonds in the present state of the sinking-fund law, the creditor will have a right to rely upon that, and in taking bonds at a lower rate of interest he undoubtedly will rely upon it as a special pledge of the good faith of the Government to accumulate the means of paying it off; and having done so, we cannot change it afterward as to him any more than we can as to those who already hold it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, all but about $500,000,000 of the bonds of the United States that are now out are bearing 6 900 of the bonds of the United States that are now out are bearing 6 per cent. interest, therefore it is exceedingly important that we should reduce the charge on the Treasury as much as possible by getting an issue of bonds at a lower rate of interest. This proposition is merely to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the interest-bearing debt that we have at the rate of 6 per cent. for the lower rate of 4½, saving thereby 1½ per cent. upon the interest. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa to do away with the operation of the sinking fund upon this bill would make the bill most likely nugatory, for the advantage that we give in the longer bonds would be at least for the advantage that we give in the longer bonds would be at least counterbalanced by the proposition to do away with the sinking fund. Why, sir, it is one of the first elements in the credit of the fund. Why, sir, it is one of the first elements in the credit of the United States that we are a debt-paying people, and that we mean to pay this debt, and to contribute something toward that end annually. That is our public pledge, and to do away with it would mar the face of this legislation so that it would be impossible, in my judgment, for the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the loan. We have no for the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the loan. We have no authorized loan law now that will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to get money at 4½ per cent., and he believes that, if Congress shall authorize this loan to the extent of $500,000,000, and for thirty years, he may be able to negotiate it. I think we ought to let him try, and not embarrass him by any proposition that will have the effect of being a blot upon the credit of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Ido not quite understand the logic of my friend from Vermont. It is claimed as a merit in this bill that the time is extended from fifteen to thirty years. Why? Because a long bond will be more readily sought for by investors. That is the object of it. We now have provided a sinking fund by which this identical bond must be redeemed within twenty-three years. Then what do we say to these creditors We say to them "we are giving you a thirty-year bond, but we must either redeem it or buy it at a rate above par within twenty-three years." I do not understand that a provision declaring that these bonds shall not be redeemed within thirty years will at all affect their value. In fact I think it will have the effect to increase the value of the bonds in the market. People will say: "Here is a bond that may be invested in as a security for bank circulation or it may be used to invest for trust funds. It is an absolute investment for thirty years."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the way it is now as the bill stands.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the way it is now, except that we have also another provision which says virtually that the sinking fund shall continue to operate, and good faith and honesty on the part of the Government require that it shall continue to operate until it exhausts

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we cannot take up these bonds without the consent of the holder. It would only make them a valuable bond to holders, who will buy them much more readily for that reason.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be true; but I say it is hardly just that the Government should leave these bonds out to be purchased within twenty-three years at a rate above par; and therefore I see no objection to making a provision whereby this particular loan shall be exempt from the operations of the sinking fund. I think it would rather add to the value than diminish the value of the bond. It is no repudiation in any sense, no violation of any contract, implied or otherwise. If the purchasers of these bonds take them in the open market with the understanding that the sinking fund does not apply

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The proposition existing on the statutes providing for a sinking fund would not have the effect that the Senator from Iowa seems to suppose. Why, sir, within my recollection the Government of the United States has taken up its bonds and paid a premium of 16 per cent. upon them. Those bonds were, howpaid a premium of 16 per cent. upon them. Those bonds were, however, such as bore the rate of 6 per cent. interest. It is not at all likely that bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest within any time, within thirty years certainly, will be worth much more than par; but, as has been said by my colleague, these bonds cannot be taken out of the hands of the holders, except by their consent, and the Government of the United States would be compelled to buy them for the sinking fund, if it chose, when the time should arrive. At all events, if the Government should then offer them the money, and they refuse to account it it seems to me the provisions of the public law would be to accept it, it seems to me the provisions of the public law would be complied with. I should lament the idea of our touching that fund at the present time by any such suggestion or proposition as the Senator from Iowa makes, because I see that it will not only damage the ator from lowa makes, because I see that it will not only damage the credit of the country in negotiating these bonds, but it casts a blight over our whole public debt.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, I am not especially a champion of bondholders or public creditors; but it is my conclusion, derived from the reading of history and some little experience in such matters, that it is a very difficult thing to keep a provision for a sinking fund unimpaired. I regard it as a very vital thing to the credit of a state or nation that whatever provision of the kind has been made should be kent unimpaired.

should be kept unimpaired.

I think, therefore, looking beyond any effect upon this particular measure, we cannot afford, in providing for a new loan or in making a provision for funding debts that have already been incurred, to commence what will look like a disposition to ignore the provisions of the sinking fund for the redemption of the debt. I therefore think it much better that this bill should pass in the shape in which it is.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to amend the bill, in section 1, by striking out, commencing in line 6, the following words:

That the amount of bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest authorized to be issued be increased to $500,000,000; and that they be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, instead of after fifteen years.

So that the bill shall read:

That the bonds now authorized to be issued, bearing 4½ per cent interest be made payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, instead of after fifteen years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment for this reason: When we stipulate that the amount of $500,000,-000 is authorized we do not provide that $500,000,000 shall be issued. We reserve our right at any time to withdraw these bonds from market and fall back on the 4 per cent. bonds or any other bonds that we choose to offer. But when we make an offer to sell our bonds, stipulating the amount, we are bound by that offer, and we cannot increase the amount or change the terms and conditions of the bond without an imputation that we have not lived up fully to our agreement. Although it is true when we offer $300,000,000 of bonds for sale we do not expressly agree that we will issue no more of that kind, yet there is a sort of implied obligation which raises a presumption that we shall be bound by our offer and shall confine our offers in the future to 4 per cent. bonds. Although that may be rather shadowy in the private transactions of life, yet in dealing with public affairs it is always regarded as binding to some extent on a government. All the negotiations for the placing of this loan have been based by the present Secretary of the Treasury on the right to issue, if we choose to do it, $500,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds. We may not issue more than $200,000,000 or may not issue more than $300,000,000; we are not bound to issue all. The time may be favorable for the negotiation of a 4 per cent. bond; and who would be so ready to step negotiation of a 4 per cent. bond; and who would be so ready to step into the market and sell a bond at a lower rate of interest as the man who is charged with this duty and who would have the credit of performing it?

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether, if the bill passes in its present form, it will not necessarily reduce by that amount the 4 per cent. bonds that may be hereafter negotiated?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McDONALD. And limit them on the principle argued by the Senator to the amount now authorized, less the sum that is taken Senator to the amount now authorized, less the sum that is taken from them by this bill increasing the 4½ per cent. bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. There the Senator is mistaken. The amount that he sells of these bonds reduces the amount of 4 per cent. bonds, but the mere provision of a law granting the permissive authority to sell a 4½ per cent. bond does not limit the amount. If he should sell 4½ per cent. bonds, to that extent the amount of the 4 per cent. bonds would be reduced. That is the construction that has always been given to the law. If he should now, after we have given him the state of the should sell 4½. given to the law. If he should now, after we have given him this authority, find that he could sell a 4 per cent. bond, then his authority to sell the 4 per cent. bonds extends to a thousand million dollars, or the whole amount of 6 per cent. bonds of the United States. The only conditions that limit him are that he shall not increase the principal of the bonded debt, that when he sells one bond the proceeds of that bond shall pay off another outstanding bond bearing a higher rate of interest. Under all the circumstances, I think it is better to leave this proposition to stand on the basis of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury because his previous negotiations made under the operation of the law of 1870 have been based on the idea that not to exceed $500,000,000 of these bonds should be 5 per cents, $500,000,000 4½ per cents, and the balance 4 per cents. Is it not better and wiser for us to leave this detail to him, rather than ourselves upon casual debate and insufficient reasoning probably, change the relative amounts? As a matter of course it will not destroy the merit of this bill, the object of which is at once to save to the Government a large sum of money in interest; but it will impair and derange to some extent the plan that has already been blocked out and talked over and negotiated about, for the sale of 41 per cent.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I feel inclined to favor the amend-Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I feel inclined to favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. The only difference between his amendment, as I understand, and the bill is that if his amendment be adopted, the amount of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. bonds to be put on the market will be \$300,000,000. Now it seems to me that \$300,000,000 of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cents would be quite enough to put on the market at one time, and I certainly do hope that by the time that loan shall be taken up we shall be in such a financial condition as to be able to sell at par 4 per cent. bonds. When we come to consider the great advantage of holding 4 per cents wholly free from taxation, bearing a rate of interest as high almost as any European government, fully as high as any European government in good credit pays, I do not think it is advisable to put more bonds than are absolutely necessary upon the market at any higher rate of interest than 4 per cent. The as fight as any European government in good credit pays, I do not think it is advisable to put more bonds than are absolutely necessary upon the market at any higher rate of interest than 4 per cent. The truth of it is that one of the great reasons for a high rate of interest in any country is the high rate of interest paid by its government. The current rate of interest in a country will never be as low as the interest paid by the government. That I believe is almost an axiom. If we pay 4½ per cent., you will never have money loaned at less than 4½ per cent., in the country; and if we pay 6 per cent. you never will have money loaned at less than 6 per cent.

But it seems to me—I say it without having known that this bill was to come up to-day, and therefore without much reflection upon it—that $300,000,000 of 4½ per cents are quite sufficient to put upon the market at once, and I cannot help saying that I regard with some disfavor the idea of extending for a great length of time this public debt of the United States. It looks like making it a perpetuity. But I do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury could sell a 4½ per cent. bond if it were only a fifteen-year bond; and yet I should think he could. At all events, if the time is to be extended to thirty years in order to give greater value to the bond, I for one think that we ought to sell not more than $300,000,000 of this class of bonds.

I throw out these remarks without having seen the bill until this moment, and therefore, of course, without having reflected upon it.

moment, and therefore, of course, without having reflected upon it. They are mere first suggestions, and may be very erroneous; but that is the way the matter strikes me. Indeed, I could wish that this measure could lie over until to-morrow that it might be considered by those who have not looked into it, at least by myself. However, I do not make that motion, but I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDonald.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reply especially to what was said by the Senator from Ohio who last addressed the Senate, [Mr. Thurman,] I desire to say that, while this proposition is not material to the success of the undertaking, it seems to me that the recommendation made by the Senate, I can Secretary of the Treasury should be agreed to by the Senate. I cannot myself anticipate that we shall at present be able to dispose of a not myself anticipate that we shall at present be able to dispose of a 4 per cent. bond unless we give it a very long time for maturity. Possibly a fifty-year or sixty-year bond might be sold at par bearing interest at 4 per cent., but I should myself much prefer that the Government should issue a 4½ per cent. bond payable in thirty years than a 4 per cent. bond payable in fifty or sixty years.

I think, too, the Senator from Ohio upon reflection will agree that, excepting the British consols, there are no public securities in the markets of the world sold at par bearing a rate of interest as low as 4½ per cent., and the British consols are not sold out of the realm; they are not in the markets of Continental Europe at all. The French loan bearing interest at 5 per cent. was actually sold to the bankers loan bearing interest at 5 per cent. was actually sold to the bankers at something less than eighty-four cents on the dollar. Now, to my mind it is so much of an achievement for this country to sell  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. bonds, that I am glad to see the time when it is practicable to undertake it.

If I supposed that we could reach the time when we should sell a 4 per cent. bond on thirty years, perhaps I should hesitate whether we ought to authorize the issue of $500,000,000 of 4½ per cents; but I believe we shall be compelled to issue as many as $500,000,000 of 4½ per cents before we shall reach that time. There is this advantage in having the loan a unit; if we are to issue a given sum of 4½ per cent. bonds, it is better that they should be authorized by one act, that they should be issued as one loan, that they should stand on the records of the Treasury Department and be known in the markets of the world as a part of that particular loan. One of our difficulties— not a very serious one—has been that we have too many loans upon the books of the Treasury and in the markets of the country and of the world.

There is this further consideration, which I think justifies fully the measure. It is not probable, indeed I may say it is not possible, that the whole of these bonds should be taken at once by one set of men. I have no idea that men could be found prepared to enter into an en-I have no idea that men could be found prepared to enter into an engagement to take $500,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, and I have no idea that any Secretary of the Treasury would commit the Government to so great an undertaking, the wisdom of which could only be demonstrated by future events which he could not foresee. Therefore it would happen, as these bonds would be taken in small blocks of five, ten, or twenty millions of dollars as compared with the whole, that if our credit should so advance that we could negotiate a 4 per could be able to sell'41 percent bonds at a premium. that if our credit should so advance that we could negotiate a per cent. bond, we should be able to sell'4½ per cent. bonds at a premium, which would give us the advantage of the difference; so that, in fact, we shall pay interest upon these bonds according to the markets of the world based upon our credit. If we were selling 6 per cent. bonds, we should probably get a large premium; but inasmuch as it is an object to reduce the interest, if we offer a 4½ per cent. bond to the object to reduce the interest, if we offer a 4½ per cent, bond to the markets of the world and the credit of the country should be such that a 4 per cent, bond would sell at par, we should be able to get a premium on the 4½ per cent, bonds commensurate with the condition of things. Therefore the Government will not be a loser by making the sum of 4½ per cent, bonds $500,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDonald,] upon which the yeas and never have been ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Patents, I move to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of John R. Harrington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, in the chair.) The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. WINDOM. That is all I desire.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2285) authorizing the purchase of additional ground for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee;
A bill (H. R. No. 710) to protect the revenues of the Patent Office;
A bill (H. R. No. 1677) to correct a mistake in and amend section 1375 of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved

May 10, 1872; and utes, inclusive.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up House bill No. 810, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The Committee on Appropriations reported the bill with amendments

The first amendment was to insert after line 10 the following item: For additional pay of professors for length of service, $6,800,

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that this first amendment is for addi-Mr. DAVIS. I understand that this first amendment is for additional service independent of the regular pay. It is $6,800 in advance of what the House provided for in the bill. It is a question only whether additional pay to the amount allowed under the Army regulations shall be given to these professors. Their pay, it will be seen, is four at $3,500, and five at $3,000 a year. This is for additional pay, as I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from West Virginia has stated the facts. The law provides that the professors at West Point shall be ranked as colonels or lieutenant-colonels respectively, and receive pay accordingly, and therefore they are entitled to longevity pay; and this sum is necessary to be appropriated in order to give them the pay that the law entitles them to. That is all there is of it, and I suppose there will be no objection to the amendment. The law pro-suppose there will be no objection to the amendment. The law provides that they shall have this pay. It is not for the Committee on Appropriations to modify the law. Therefore they have proposed to appropriate just what the law requires.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say that the law provides that "the Army of the United States shall consist of," among others, "the professors and corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy." By the law the professors of the Military Academy are made a part and parcel of the Army; and they are entitled by the operation of law to this additional pay for length of service, as the Senator from Iowa has

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is eminently proper and right. There are no officers of the United States Army who are more justly entitled to or who are more worthy of this longevity pay than the gentlemen who are doing as much for the advancement of the Army as any men, perhaps more than any other men in the entire service. I say this, Mr. President, because I happen to be a graduate of that institution, and I know the services performed by the professors. Look at the great men who have been sent out from that institution, commencing with the President of the United States, the General-in-Chief of the present Army, and Hancock, McClellan, McPherson, and a great portion of the distinguished men of the Army; and turn then over to the other side and contemplate Lee, Jackson, Joe Johnston, and Albert Johnston, and men of that class, and you will perceive that there are no men who have ever appeared on the stage of public action more distinguished than those who have been turned out by the professors of this institution. When you look at the Mexican war you will find that that war was controlled mainly by men who had come from this academy.

I thought at the time the bill passed the House of Representatives that this cutting down of the pay of the professors of an institution which it has been the pride and glory of the people of the United States to make the best military institution on the face of the earth, as it is now, was saving at the spigot and losing at the bung. I stand here to-day to speak in behalf of these men. One of them, who was one of my professors, graduated forty years ago.—Professor Kendrick; Professor Church more than forty years ago. The school-books of Professor Davies are in almost every log-cabin or house throughout the length and breadth of the land; they are everywhere. The works of Professor Mahan are distinguished authority not only with civil and with military engineers in the United States but also in Europe. might also refer to Bartlett on natural and experimental philosophy, and to Church's recent works on mathematics.

If we desire to preserve this as one of the great institutions of this country to which the poorest boy in the land may go and hope by due diligence to become one of the distinguished men of the country, if we want to make it a great institution, let us pay the men who are there a just and fair compensation for their services. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and these men ought to have what the law allows them. It is just, proper, and right that they should have it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I did not desire to call the attention of

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I did not desire to call the attention of the Senate to this particular amendment, but the Senator from West Virginia having expressed a desire to have the House of Representatives sustained in its action, I am led to make a remark that probably I should not otherwise have made. This proposition shows that men sometimes, for the purpose of making it appear that they desire to exercise economy and retrench in reference to expenditures, do it on matters that they know nothing about. Now, if I understand the province of an appropriation bill it is to provide the necessary money to comply with the law requiring appropriations for the particular service, and it is no part of an appropriation bill to repeal existing statutes, although it is sometimes done. I speak of it as a general proposition. And certainly to pass an appropriation bill which, while not attempting to repeal the statute requiring a certain appropriation to carry it out, reduces the appropriation, shows either a determination to violate the law or an amount of ignorance that is perfectly astounding. Now, the law regulating the organization of the Army, which has within itself the organization of the West Point Military Acadhas within itself the organization of the West Point Military Academy, provides for certain officials, certain professors, and superintendents, &c. In providing for these professors it gives to them a certain stipulated salary. In other words, these professors have what is called in military parlance assimilated rank; that is to say, they rank as a colonel or lieutenant-colonel. The law organizing the Army and providing for the pay of the Army provides that a lieutenant-colonel shall receive a certain amount as pay proper; then he is entitled to certain rations and other perquisites; and, in addition to that, when an officer has served in the Army a certain length of time, there is added then to his pay a certain amount called commonly "the longevity ration."

The law organizing the Army provides for the pay of its officers certain amounts stipulated to each one. An appropriation bill by Congress for the purpose of providing the necessary sums to pay the Congress for the purpose of providing the necessary sums to pay the Army must provide the amount stipulated in the statute, or else Congress does not perform its duty. As I said, it is no part of the business of a Committee on Appropriations, or of Congress even, to reduce the amount allowed as salary, except they first repeal the law fixing the salary. While it stands upon the state-book it is incumbent upon Congress to appropriate the necessary amount of money to carry out the law. The attempt is made here to reduce the salary by saying that these professors shall be paid so much, without repealing the law that authorizes these men to be appointed as professors and stipulating the amount of their salary. Hence I said that the idea of getting up appropriation bills in this way exhibits either a desire on the part of persons doing it to show a false economy before the country, or an amount of ignorance that any man ought to be ashamed of who would undertake to make such a proposition before Congress.

I agree with the committee's amendment as being in accordance with the provisions of law on which this appropriation bill should be based and the duty incumbent on Congress to provide the necessary means for the purpose of carrying out that law.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no acquaintance with military matters, and it may be that I do not understand exactly the duties of an Appropriation Committee. I find, however, here a bill which has come from the other House of Congress which provides for four professors of the Military Academy an appropriation of $3,500 each and for five professors an appropriation to pay them $3,000 each per annum. The question which addresses itself to me is, is that sufficient for that service? I do not know all the particular duties of a professor in the Military Academy, but I apprehend that their duties are not more onerous than the duties of professors in many other educational in-stitutions, and there are very few professors throughout this country who are receiving the pay which is provided for these military pro-fessors as the bill came to us from the House.

There is no censure to be attributed to anybody because of an exhibition of a desire for economy. I think it is commendable in the House committee, if I may be allowed to refer to that body, and it will be commendable in this body to exhibit to the people of this country, who are laboring under taxation almost beyond any that ever existed in any country, a disposition for some degree of economy; and if we find that an appropriation heretofore has existed which was exorbitant, it becomes the duty of this Senate in making provisision by appropriation bills this year not to provide for excessive pay to any officer whether in the military or in the civil department of the Government.

the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.
Mr. LOGAN. A military officer, so far as his pay is concerned, by law stands upon the same principle that a Senator does in reference to his pay. Now suppose the Appropriation Committee without repealing the law fixing the salary of the Senator should appropriate for him $4,000 for the last year, would he not have a claim against the Government for the other $1,000?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That may be.

Mr. LOGAN. It may be. I ask the Senator if it is not the law? Mr. SAULSBURY. It may be that I would waive any further claim.

Mr. LOGAN. But the point is not that he might waive that; I am speaking of the legal proposition. Unless the Senator's salary has been repealed and a new law passed establishing it at $4,000, the duty of the Appropriation Committee and of Congress is to provide for his salary as the law fixes it at $5,000, and not for his salary not fixed by law. That is the point I am making, that the law does fix the salary, and it is the duty of Congress to appropriate the money for that salary until Congress repeals that law or reduces the salary; and inasmuch as that is not done, it is our duty to appropriate for what the law requires

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I understand the duties of these gentlemen, comparing their services with those of other instructors in schools of instruction, I apprehend that the pay proposed by the House bill is at least as remunerative as that of other gentlemen engaged in the duties of instruction. That being the case, the bill having been presented from the other House for concurrence of the Senate, acting upon my own judgment as to what is the proper appropriation to make, and finding that the amount fixed in this bill is considered adequate by gentlemen who have examined this question, I am not disposed to advance upon that allowance and say that there shall be a greater amount paid. I therefore shall vote against this amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I ask his pardon for correcting him; it is not an advance upon the allowance at all. It is merely allowing them what the law allows them; that is all. There is no advance whatever. It is an advance upon what the House has allowed, but it is not an advance upon their legal compensation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is an advance upon what has been fixed as the proper allowance by one House of Congress; and when it comes to the Senate and our committee see proper to raise that sum, they must at least satisfy me that the appropriation is not sufficient for this purpose; that it is not an adequate compensation for the services rendered. So far as I am able to judge of this matter I should suppose that the appropriations made in the House bill are ample for the service rendered to the Government. I have no doubt that there have been larger appropriations heretofore; that these gentlemen have been receiving larger salaries than this bill would allow them; but if their salary has been too large heretofore it is no reason why we should provide the means to continue that excessive allowance we should provide the means to continue that excessive allowance. Therefore, judging from the best information I can have on the subject, that the appropriation made in the bill as it came from the House is adequate for the services rendered by these gentlemen to the Government, I propose to adhere to the appropriation in the House bill and to vote against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEST. The proposition of the Senator from Delaware is equivalent to a reduction of the pay of all the Army.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When that question comes before me I will consider it.

It is necessarily before the Senate now. The statute of February 28, 1873, fixed the rank of these officers as respectively that of colonel and lieutenant-colonel, in the following words:

That the professors of the United States Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel.

Consequently we have in this bill a clause for pay of four professors, with the rank of colonel, whose term of service exceeds ten years, $3,500 each; and for pay of five professors, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, whose pay amounts to $3,000 a year each. Under the law we are compelled to appropriate this amount, or else we must reduce the pay of every colonel and lieutenant-colonel in the Army. That is the equivalent of it. We have no such discretion, and most assuredly it does not pertain to the Committee on Appropriations to intrude upon the organization of the Army and affect its pay. If the Senator sees proper, let him bring in a bill for the reduction of the pay of the officers of the Army; but as long as these professors are entitled to the pay of officers and it is fixed, certainly it devolves upon the Comthe pay of officers and it is fixed, cottainly it devolves upon the Committee on Appropriations and the Senate to pay the amount. They rank as colonels and lieutenant-colonels and they are allowed this percentage by law. One of these gentlemen has been there since 1837, a period of nearly forty years; another man has been there thirty years; and the amendment provides a distribution of $6,800 under the law among eight professors for length of service. If the Senator is right in his proposition, a reduction must apply to all the officers of the Army; but until it does so apply we most assuredly ought to make the appropriation according to the amendment of the committee.

of the Army; but until it does so apply we most assuredly ought to make the appropriation according to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I conceive that if there is any disposition in the Senate to make the wording of the bill conform to the practice, or in other words to repeal the existing law on this subject, all we need say is "hereafter the pay shall be so and so." That will accomplish the object. There is no difficulty as to making the bill agree with the law. Whether it would be right or whether it would be best to do it, I am not prepared to say. I felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this was an advance over what the House bill had proposed and in doing that I felt that I was but do. House bill had proposed, and in doing that I felt that I was but doing my duty.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no criticism to make on the Senator's perform-

Mr. DAVIS. I was just coming to the point of ignorance—
Mr. DAVIS. I was just coming to the point of ignorance—
Mr. LOGAN. At that point I would like to make a suggestion to the Senator. My criticism was on the House bill. He says it is very easy for the Senate to amend the House bill in order to conform with the law. That is very true; but it is not amended. I ask him if, when the House sends us a bill with a reduced salary without a clause connected with it repealing the law fixing the salary so as to give them a right to reduce it, it is right for us to refuse to agree with the House? They have certainly no right to reduce your salary unless they repeal the law giving it to you. The Senate may repeal the law in connection with the House, but until that is done it is certainly expected that the appropriations shall be made to comply with the law

Mr. DAVIS. I think there should be no difficulty as to what had better be done. If we reduce the salaries we had better say, "hereafter the salaries shall be so and so;" but the House had a perfect right to send us the bill as we find it, and I think they passed it in good faith. If there were no authority for the passage of this bill as it came from the House reducing the pay of those persons, they would claim it hereafter, and would certainly get it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to read the law, he will see himself that such a claim would be perfectly just on their part. They could claim the extent of the reduction.

Mr. DAVIS. My friend from Illinois does not ask me if I question that, I hope. Mr. LOGAN. No; but I want to read the law in order that we may all understand it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to hearing the law read.
Mr. LOGAN. I will read. The pay bill of the Army, as it is called, providing for the pay of officers of the Army, enacts that a colonel shall receive $3,500 a year. That is the pay proper. Then the law provides that-

There shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer below the rank of rigadier-general * * * 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each term brigadier-general * * * 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each term of five years of service.

The total amount of such increase for length of service shall in no case exceed 40 per cent. on the yearly pay of the grade as provided by law.

For every five years' service that these professors have perfomed 10 per cent. is added to their pay proper, which is $3,500 per annum. The man who has served thirty years, or twenty years, or five years, receives this per cent. according to the number of years he has served. It is a part of the pay; it is a part of the allowance to officers of the Army by law for term of service. Hence I say that no Congress has a right to appropriate less money than these officers are entitled to receive, unless it repeals this law which allows them that amount of money. If Congress reduces the appropriation for the salary without repealing the law, then the officer has a claim against the Government that no government can refuse to nay. That is the the Government that no government can refuse to pay. That is the point. Therefore I speak of our duty as a Congress to appropriate the proper amount of money unless we repeal the law; and I am opposed to repealing the law for the reason that I do not think these officers receive any more than they are entitled to.

Mr. MAXEY. It is perfectly manifest, Mr. President, that the law makes the professors at West Point a part of the Army. The law, then, assimilates the rank of a professor to rank in the Army, making the rank of certain of them colonel and certain of them lieutenantcolonel. So long as that law exists, these gentlemen are entitled to the pay which officers of the same rank and grade are entitled to. They are entitled by law to the allowances which that rank and grade call for. I assert that unless you repeal the law establishing the institution at West Point you must pay them the amount to which they are entitled according to the rank and pay fixed in the Army.

So far as the action of the House of Representatives is concerned,

I do not pretend to know whether the House examined the law or not. I have; and perhaps I am as familiar with the law on this subject as any member of the House; at least I think I am. These men are entitled to this pay and these allowances by law; and, as was well said by the Senator from Illinois, until you repeal this law they are so entitled, and Congress has no right, so long as the law is in force and effect, to cut down one solitary farthing of their pay.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to say to my friend from Texas that there is no question as to the law. As the law exists these gentlemen are entitled to the additional pay which the amendment provides for. No one has questioned that; but do I understand the Senator to say that it is not competent for Congress to declare that hereafter they shall be paid so and so? Do I understand that the act established. lishing the Military Academy must be repealed in order to fix the salary of the professors at less than it allows?

Mr. MAXEY. I understand this: That whenever it comes to the point that the Committee on Appropriations has to pass on the re-point that the Committee on Appropriations has to pass on the revision of the laws, to say what laws shall be repealed and what laws shall stand, you will introduce a new system in the United States. I say that such questions should go to the proper committee which has charge of the branch of the public service proposed to be affected. Here there is no pretense of repealing this law. The law itself is left in full force and effect. The law being in full force and effect, this Congress cannot, by possibility, take one dollar from these professors.

Mr. DAVIS. Will my friend answer me a question?

Mr. MAXEY. When I understand what it is, I shall be happy to do so.

do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Does my friend question the authority of the Senate to make these gentlemen's pay $3,500 or $3,000, no matter what the law heretofore may have been ?

Mr. MAXEY. Of course not. You can repeal the law establishing the Academy, if you choose.
Mr. DAVIS. There is, the

There is, then, no question about it.

Mr MAXEY. But I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that the House of Representatives has not attempted to do that.
Mr. DAVIS. But we are talking about whether we will do it or

Mr. MAXEY. You can introduce a bill repealing the Academy, if you wish.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand my friend to say that if we want to fix these gentlemen's salary at the amount named in the House bill—and whether that be right or wrong I am not now discussing—it is necessary to introduce a bill or to repeal any law? Can we not say in this bill that hereafter the salaries of these professors shall be so

Mr. MAXEY. You cannot do it unless you cut down the pay of every officer of the United States Army.
Mr. DAVIS. That is another matter.
Mr. MAXEY. Because, as I have already said, (and I understand the question as well as the Senator perhaps,) the rank of the professors at West Point assimilates to the rank of officers in the Army. The law makes the professors part and parcel of the Army. The law designates who of them shall be colonels and who shall be lieutenant. designates who of them shall be colonels and who shall be lieutenantcolonels. Their pay, therefore, is that of colonels of the Army, with the allowances of colonels of the Army, or the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels, as the case may be. You cannot, then, cut down the pay of these officers unless you correspondingly cut down the pay of every officer of the Army. That is just as plain as a thing can be;
and I was very much gratified indeed that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs stated the question so clearly. It is true that, if you cut their pay down, you must necessarily cut down the pay of all others having corresponding rank.

In regard to the idea of repealing laws by an Appropriation Com-

pay of all others having corresponding rank.

In regard to the idea of repealing laws by an Appropriation Committee, the point was well put by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the same authority which would justify the cutting down of the pay of these professors at West Point, leaving the law as it is in full force, would also justify the cutting down of the pay of members of Congress from $5,000 to $4,000 without repealing the law establishing their salary. The whole proposition as it comes from the House of Representatives is utterly absurd on that point.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas, and also the Senator from Illipois, the chairman of the Military Committee.

the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Military Committee, have seemed to proceed upon an idea that the House appropriation was a failure by that body to provide for the existing salaries of these men. This appropriation is for the year commencing on the 1st of July of the present year and ending the 30th of June, 1877. It therefore affects no right of the professors at the present time. It is an fore affects no right of the professors at the present time. It is an appropriation in futuro to be applied to these gentlemen not for the service which they are to-day rendering, but for the service which service which they are to-day rendering, but for the service which they are to render in the future. Now I apprehend that it is competent for Congress to say what a military officer who accepts a special service shall have for that special service; and though his pay as a military officer might be a certain particular sum, yet if he sees proper to accept of this special service at a less sum, it is perfectly competent on the part of Congress to provide that that lesser sum shall be the compensation which he shall receive.

But the suggestion is made by the Senator from Louisiana that it involves the pecessity of the reneal of the compensation to colonels.

involves the necessity of the repeal of the compensation to colonels and lieutenant-colonels and military officers generally. Well, sir, so far as I am concerned, without knowing much about military life, or the proper compensation of military life, I have no question that we are expending in the training of military men much more in this country than is absolutely necessary. The learned Senator from Illinois, who himself was a distinguished soldier in the late war, will bear me witness that we have men in this country without military training equal to any emergencies that may arise in the country. I training equal to any emergencies that may arise in the country. can see therefore no necessity for this continual drain upon the Treasury of the country; I can see no necessity for this continual taxation upon the people of the country in order that we may have a splendid military establishment, and in time of peace keep up a large army, and the officers competent for a large army, at an enormous expense to the people of the country, when we ought to reduce it very materially. I have thought that our present Army was entirely too large; I think so still; but I am not satisfied that there ought not to be a detail from the military authorities to guard the public Treasury of the country. There is a continual abstraction by way of appropriations unnecessarily large from the Treasury which ought not to be tolerated. There is too much expense upon the people of this country by military establishments, and by other services, which ought to be curtailed; and for one, if the proposition were here today, I would go for a reduction of the Army, and especially for a reduction of the officers of the Army; for I believe there is no necessity that the people of this country should be burdened with even the present existing military establishment. I am not in favor of the abolition of the Army entirely, but I am in favor of such a reduction as will be a sensible relief to the tax-payers of this country. I think we might reduce our Army to 15,000 men, or not exceeding 20,000 men at the outside. This would save from five to ten millions to the Treasury of the country. Here is a proposition in this bill to reduce the compensation now allowed to certain men detailed as public into be tolerated. There is too much expense upon the people of this structors in military life. I propose to adhere to the allowance made by the House of Representatives, and to go against this proposed increase by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I hardly expected at the opening of this debate that it would take the direction that it has, but I am quite confident that I stated the proposition of the Senator from Delaware correctly, that, if it was intended to reduce the pay of these professors, in order to be consistent there ought to be a proposition to reduce the pay of all the officers of the Army; and now the Senator says that in that proposition he entirely accords. He thinks that ought to be done. Well, sir, the Senator is a distinguished representative of his party, and I presume he speaks the desires and feelings of that side of the Chamber when he says so. I am glad that at this time that Senator and his party have discovered a new-found zeal for economy in mili-tary affairs, for the records of the War Department and the pay and disbursements of the Army evidence this fact, that from 1840 to 1860, when this country was under the exclusive control of the party of which that gentleman is a distinguished member, the expenses of the Army per man were more than they have been under a republican administration during the peace establishment since the war.

As I said, I did not expect that the debate would take that particular complexion, but I should like to put that statement in contrast with the Senator's desire for economy, that from 1840 to 1860—and I shall have the pleasure of showing the fact in the figures here as we progress in these economical debates—the expenses per capita of the Army of the United States were more than they have been from 1866 to 1876 per man. When those disbursements were made they were in gold, and when they have been made from the period of 1866 to 1876 they have been made at the discount at which we all know to 1870 they have been made at the discount at which we all know our currency has been. Let that much go with the Senator's profession of economy. The economy has been shown; the economy has been shown by this Senate, by this party all the way through, and I think when Senators on the other side propose their parings they certainly must comply with the law in the first place and they must give judicious reasons for those parings in the second place. judicious reasons for those parings in the second place.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the law requires that this approriation shall be made. That has been stated over and over again. The question of reducing the compensation of officers of the Army is another question and a distinct one, which certainly ought not to is another question and a distinct one, which certainly ought not to be committed to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Military Affairs are abundantly able to take charge of the ques-tion of the pay of the Army, and certainly would have a right to complain if the Committee on Appropriations attempted to usurp their authority.

It is said that we can change the law so as to reduce this compensation. So we can.

Mr. LOGAN. Right on that point, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to make a suggestion which perhaps he has thought of himself. It is proposed in this bill to reduce the pay of the professors. Sup-It is proposed in this bill to reduce the pay of the professors. Suppose one of these professors at West Point is to-day a colonel in the Army or a lieutenant-colonel, I ask how can you reduce his pay as lieutenant-colonel in the Army without reducing the pay of all the other lieutenant-colonels in the Army? If you reduce the pay of a professor having that rank who belongs to the Army, you must reduce the pay of all; or else you make a discrimination between officers of the same rank in the Army.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, if an officer at West Point who is now officer of the Army, should have his pay reduced under the opera-an officer of the Army should have his pay reduced under the opera-tion of this bill, he would be obliged either to leave West Point or practically to have his pay below that of those equal in rank with him. But this pay is limited. Every officer of the Army of the United States under the statutes of the United States has what is known as longevity pay, which I believe is 10 per cent. for each five years of service; but that longevity pay has a limitation; it cannot exceed 40 per cent. in all. Now, the professors at West Point are placed upon an equality with colonels and lieutenant-colonels in the Army. That is no new proposition. That proposition was embodied in the organization of West Point in 1812, assimilating them in rank with officers of the Army. Afterward it was repealed, and then again restored, and it is found now in section 1336 of the Revised Statutes.

But these officers earn this pay. I am willing to meet the Senator from Delaware upon this broad proposition. They are generally men who have served in the Army; their rank is limited by accepting commissions at West Point. Every other officer in the Army may be promoted to brigadier-general, major-general, and so on to the end of promotion; but the moment any officer is commissioned as a professor at West Point, that moment his rank is limited to colonel, and he does not receive the promotion that is open to other officers. These men have served many years; some of them I believe forty years; at least one of them, Professor Church, graduated forty years ago, and has been a professor continuously since that time at West Point. His salary is $4,500. It is no more than he earns, and I would deprecate any reduction of his salary either by operation of a general law or by means of any special enactment.

Every one knows the efficiency of West Point. As was said the other day about Harvard, it is progressing constantly; it is now harder to get into it, and harder to stay in it, and harder to get out of it than at any former period; and it does seem to me that it is a poor place to begin economy to strike down the instructors of the men who are to support the Republic in future years in case of necessity. There, of all other places, should the laborer receive the proper reward for his services.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. ALLISON, Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It has been stated here by the Senator from Illinois, I believe, and also by the Senator from Texas, and I think by the Senator from lowa, that these professors take the rank of column and light analysis of the case, as they will see in onel and lieutenant-colonel. That is not the case, as they will see if they will examine the law.

Mr. MAXEY. Assimilated rank is what they have. Mr. SAULSBURY. I will read what the law says:

Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowance of colonel—  $\,$

It does not give him the rank and title of coloneland all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel.

That was the provision of the law for the pay of these gentlemen heretofore. The present bill provides a different compensation. These gentlemen do not take the rank of colonel. They only have the pay and allowances of colonel.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember what I stated. I said that they had the assimilated rank of colonel or lieutenant-colonel, as the case might be. They have the actual rank of colonel or lieutenant-colonel when detailed from the Army; but if a professor is appointed from civil life, he takes the assimilated rank. That is what I stated before. I said that in military parlance he had the assimilated rank. similated rank; that is, you give him the pay and allowance of a colonel, and that assimilates him to the rank of a colonel. That is what I said and that is the fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly; but my understanding all the time was that these were officers of the Army who were colonels and lieutenant-colonels.

Mr. LOGAN. Some of them are.

Mr. ALLISON. None of these professors are officers of the Army except the professor of law, and we have provided in this bill a remedy for that. They are all assimilated to the rank of colonels and lieutenant-colonels in the Army, and are placed upon the same footing with reference to the pay, emoluments, and retirement from service as officers of the rank of colonel and lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt the Senator from Iowa is right, so far as the same pay and the same allowances are concerned, that they are assimilated in those respects to colonels and lieutenantcolonels; but my point is that they are not military officers, and therefore that it is perfectly competent for us to provide and that this bill provides properly a different compensation from that which these gentlemen have heretofore been receiving. My impression was, from the remarks which were made by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Texas, as well as by the Senator from Iowa, to suppose that we might be doing injustice to these gentlemen in refusing to make an allowance which by their rank they were entitled to have. That I find is not the case. The pay which has heretofore been provided for these professors they are entitled to receive until some further action of Congress intervenes to change that allowance. This bill proposes after the 1st of July next that their compensation shall be different, and it is perfectly competent for Congress to do that, and it is no violation of any vested right of these gentlemen by virtue of any rank in the Army or otherwise.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Iowa that he held the floor and yielded it to the Senator from

Mr. ALLISON. I tried to continue holding it, but have been unable to do so. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to this point, whether or not he is willing that the Committee on Appropriations shall take exclusive charge of the business of this Senate, and report upon appropriation bills whatever remedial legislation they think ought to be had with reference to all subjects coming before Congress?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it is perfectly competent for the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives to do as they have done in this bill—provide a certain compensation for professors at the Military Academy. Then it is a question for Congress whether they will alter the law or leave it in such condition that these gentlemen might possibly have some claim against the Government. It will be an intimation on the part of Congress, at any rate, that that is the proper compensation which should be afforded; and then whatever appropriate legislation may be necessary in order to put the law in harmony with the express will of Congress in the passage of the appropriation bills should be adopted. I hope that the appropriate committee will take into consideration the propriety of so altering the law when one House of Congress has intimated the opinion that the appropriation allowed in this bill is the proper apopinion that the appropriation allowed in this oill is the proper appropriation, and so change any law that may exist upon the statute-book as to put it in perfect harmony with this intimation contained in this bill. For one, sir, if the appropriate committee should bring forward a proposition of that kind, I should vote for it. I have no question, as I said before, that these gentlemen engaged in instruction at the Military Academy are properly compensated by the bill as it came from the House. They are not rendering the hazardous and dangerons service that is rendered by colonels and lieutenant-colonels on the frontier, exposed to the inclement weather and to the dangers of frontier life. Their situation is a much more easy one. It is my opinion that the law originally was wrong which gave them the same compensation that a colonel or a lieutenant-colonel gets who is in the field chasing Indians or engaged in some remote service in the country

Mr. LOGAN. Where are our major and brigadier generals? Are they on the frontier? They are not generally found there.
Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know. I am not acquainted with that subject. The chairman of the Military Committee ought to be prepared to inform me on that subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I can do it. If the gentleman desires the information I can certainly give it to him; but the point he was speaking of was in regard to these professors not being military men. I am sure we all desire to be correct, and I will state to him that a portion of the professors at West Point are civilians. The professor of Spanish, for instance, is a civilian, but he has certain assimilated rank and certain pay. I presume the Senator is well enough acquainted with military affairs to know that no man was ever detailed as a professor of military tactics that was not an officer of the Army. So in regard to instruction in gunnery; he would not presume to say that a man who was not a military man would be put in charge of that. So a majority of the duties performed there are performed by detailed officers of the Army, but there are some officers who have been taken from civil life, and they have what is called assimilated rank, and their pay is in accordance with that assimilated rank.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that there was but one of these officers a military man. Now I find further in this bill that there is an amendment of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to insert:

For pay of one instructor of practical military engineering, in addition to pay as first lieutenant, $900.

So that you propose in this bill to insert certain amendments offered by the Committee on Appropriations to increase the compensation of military men detailed for this service. All the amendments that I have examined in reference to increased compensation reported by our committee are entirely incorrect, and I shall vote against them.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only occupy one moment further. The professors at West Point are all commissioned as professors except one, namely, the professor of law. They all have assimilated rank to the rank of colonel or lieutenant-colonel in the Army; but they are not borne on the rolls of the Army, any of them. They are all graduates of West Point, however, I believe, with the exception of two, or perhaps three. Many of them have surrendered their commissions in the regular Army to receive their commissions as professors at West Point. When they have made this exchange they are not promoted in the Army as they would have been promoted had they retained their original rank in the Army. That is all there is on that question.

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa are any of these professors in the line of the Army?

Mr. ALLISON. One of the nine professors holds the rank of major in the regular Army, in the office of the Judge-Advocate-General. All the others are commissioned as professors. We have always undertaken to pay these men according to the assimilated rank which I have named. Now, if it is thought best to chauge the organization at West Point, if it is thought best to change the organization of the Army, that is another thing; but unless you want the Committee on Appropriations to take charge of the Army, and the Navy, and the judiciary, and fix the salaries of all your officers, civil, military, and naval, you must permit the Committee on Appropriations to make these appropriations and report them to the Senate in accordance with existing law; and that is the only line which has controlled the committee in making this amendment. So far as I am concerned, I believe, and I think so far as the committee are concerned they believe, that these professors are now only receiving a proper compensation for the services they render.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment. I think that the reduction proposed by the House bill is a retreuchment in the right direction. I do not suppose that any proposition to reduce expenditures will meet with entire approval. There will always be opposition to the reduction of salaries. In advocating the reduction proposed by the House of Representatives and sought ing the reduction proposed by the House of Representatives and sought to be defeated by the amendment of the Appropriation Committee of the Senate, I am not conscious of doing any injustice to the professors at West Point. I know most of these accomplished men and esteem them highly. I desire them to be well paid. Four of them I believe receive by the House bill $3,500; five of them $3,000. I should like to be informed by the Senator who has charge of this bill what professors in the various colleges of our country receive higher compensation than these sums fixed by the House bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there are a great number, if the Senator

Mr. ALLISON. I think there are a great number, if the Senator asks me that question.

Mr. STEVENSON. In the western colleges I know of very few who get so much. In the University of Virginia—an institution equal in scholarship, not less than in the ability of its faculty, to any in this land, I might almost say in any land—I am persuaded that the average compensation of the professors will not exceed if it even reaches the minimum in this bill; but, in addition to the salaries of $3,500 and $3,000, as I understand, these nine professors at West Point have a house; are furnished with light; with fuel; with medical attendance, and I believe, though I speak without very accurate information on this last point, and if I am wrong the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] will correct me, that there is a school at West Point paid for by the Government to which the children of the professors go free. All of this is very proper, but unquestionably it should enter into the standard of the salaries. If you then add to the $3,500 salary rent, fuel, light, medical attendance, and the schooling of the children of professors, I should be glad to know in our ordinary colleges what professors are better paid. I know of none within my personal knowledge. If there are any, they constitute exceptional

I really think that the time has come when retrenchment in our public expenditures should be exercised in every Department of the public service weere it can be done without injury to the public interest. The people expect and demand it. The House of Representa-tives feel the weight of this responsibility. They have set an exam-ple in this bill which I hope the Senate will follow. The Constitution of the United States clothes the House of Representatives with the sole power to originate revenue bills. There the Representatives come every two years fresh from the people. That instrument declares that no appropriation bill touching the Army shall extend beyond two years. These are all wholesome checks in the right direction. tion. Our fathers were jealous of arbitrary power. They believed in a free government economically administered. When, therefore, a standing appropriation bill, after a full discussion of its merits, comes to the Senate from the popular branch of Congress, its recommendations should be carefully considered. No reduced item of expenditure, I submit, should be increased without some strong argument against its injustice. I am unable to perceive that the reduction of the salaries of these nine professors works any such injustice. Even after the proposed reduction, these professors will be as well paid as many other officers of the Army. The heads of some of the most responsible Bureaus of this Government, charged with the disbursement and the custody of millions of dollars, do not get so good a salary. I have listened with great pleasure to this discussion, but I have, I confess, not heard one satisfactory reason advanced why this reduction, commended to us by the House of Representatives, should not be concurred in.

I am a friend and not an enemy to West Point. I do not undervalue its importance or its usefulness. While I am not such an enthusiast as to believe the country never produced a soldier unless he was a graduate from West Point, it is a popular institution of which I feel proud and which I would perpetuate. I am proud of the distinguished generals which that academy has given the country; and I want as a Senator to be liberal to it. I am sure I shall reflect the sentiments of an enlightened constituency in voting a just and liberal compensation to these professors. I know most of them personally. They are eminent scholars, worthy in all respects of their high trust. I approve of the course of study and discipline at the Military Academy. I think some improvements might be intro-duced into the institution which would make it more popular. I desire to support and provide for this academy on a just and liberal basis. I will go no further. The people expect and demand in these times of onerous taxation a reduction of the expenses of this Government. I think we can without injustice begin on this bill. I am unwilling to support this amendment of the Senate Committee of Appropriations, but prefer the House bill. I believe that these professors in times of pecuniary depression like the present well paid at $5,000 a year, and that is nearly the salary of those who get $3,500 with the perquisites enumerated by me.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says $5,000 a year; how can he make

Mr. STEVENSON. They get $3,500 as a salary.
Mr. LOGAN. Some of them.
Mr. STEVENSON, The rent of an ordinary dwelling-house would be $1,000. Add that to the $3,500 and it is $4,500. I think fuel, light, medical attention, and schooling would very nearly make up the bal-ance. That at least is my estimate. If inaccurate, let the error be pointed out.

About make up the balance?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think so; I am sorry the Senator differs with me. But suppose that the salary is only $4,500 including perquisites; still that sum is above, as I think, two-thirds of the professorships in our American colleges. I shall therefore oppose the recommendain our American colleges. I shall therefore oppose the recommendation of the Senate committee so far as these salaries go, and adhere to the text of the House bill. I regret to disagree with the Committee on Appropriations, but my best judgment constrains me to do so.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not propose to trouble the Senator with this question much further, but I do desire that it shall be properly presented and understood. The Senator from Kentucky is a good lawyer; he certainly is a year, also Senator. He has been really as a very soll Senator. sented and understood. The Senator from Kentucky is a good lawyer; he certainly is a very able Senator. He has been making an argument apparently to me, and, I beg his pardon for saying it, not intelligible to the Senate. He says he is in favor of this reduction. How is he in favor of this reduction? Will he state to the Senate as a lawyer that this Congress has a right to violate a plain provision of the statute which declares that a certain amount of pay shall be given to each officer in the Army and at West Point, and to the civil officers of the Government? Does he hold that the Appropriation Committee has a right to violate that plain and simple provision of the law by appropriating less money than the salaries allowed by the statute? Will he state that as a lawyer to the Senate? I will give way for him to answer if he will make that statement. He knows as a lawyer that it is the duty of Congress to appropriate the amount of money required by the statutory provisions to pay the salaries of the officers of the country. He well understands that to be the rule. In this bill comon the House of Representatives they do not reduce the salaries of these men by a repeal of the law allowing them their salaries, but they arbitrarily reduce the appropriation merely, on the pretext of a false economy, that the country may understand that there is a reduction when in fact it is no reduction and the salary stands on the statute-book owing to these parties, and they are entitled and will be entitled to have it from the Government, if not in this appropriation bill, in some subsequent one. He knows that to be the law; and yet he stands here and says that he is in favor of this bill as it comes from the House with no repealing clause in reference to salaries what-ever in it and no proposition of the kind offered here.

I want to know, and I ask men who are honorable Senators and good lawyers to tell me, if each and every one of these men cannot obtain a judgment against the Government for the amount of their salaries over that which we allow them in this bill. If there is a law-yer here who will stand up and say that this is not correct law, I will take it for granted at least that he is honest in it, but I shall think that he is a very poor lawyer.

The Senator says that because other professors do not get this amount of money, therefore these men should not have it; because, forsooth, their children go to school they should not have it; because houses are furnished they should not have it. I ask, in this intelligent age if a man has ever read in the history of armies in any country under the shining sun that soldiers and officers were not provided with quarters. Does the gentleman in the light of this day and the experience of the country demand that the soldiers of the Union shall be turned out in the storm without a shelter? Is that his proposi-tion? There is not a civilized country on earth that recognizes such a proposition as that. But perhaps we furnish better quarters than they ought to have. It may be that that is the objection. I presume they ought to have. It may be that that is the objection. I presume not, however. The houses are provided already at West Point, and if you do not let somebody live in them I suppose they will rot down. They are provided for officers and soldiers, and the complaint of the gentleman is that these professors live in the houses that have been provided by the Government. If they do not live there, tell me where they shall live. Out on the rock without tent or shelter? Is that the idea?

But the next proposition is that their children go to school. If the Senator will read the statutes in reference to our Army he will find a provision that requires a school at every post in the United States; that the soldiers even shall go to school when they are not engaged in military duty; that a school of instruction shall be provided at every camp and every post for soldiers and others connected with the Army. That is the law, and it ought to be the law. Does a man presume that our Army should be a set of ignoramuses; that they should know nothing? I ask the Senator if that is his theory of instruction to an army? In time of war, when men are lying idle in camps and not on military duty, it is the rule in all armies in civilized countries that the men shall be instructed; and schools are instituted in every camp, and ought to be—everywhere that I have been at least; and it is the law to-day; and yet, because we train our soldiers as civilized men should be trained, there is complaint by our friend in reference to it.

The next proposition the Senator makes is that they get too much money. I will say to the Senator that I do not wish to enter upon the discussion of the question as to salaries now. What my position may be when that question shall properly arise I do not now state; but, so far as the salaries that are paid to the professors at West Point are concerned, I do not believe they are too much. I do not believe that you can obtain well-instructed persons, calculated and qualified to instruct men to become intelligent and learned soldiers, for any less than is paid to these men. Four thousand dollars a year some of them perhaps get on account or their age in the service. Those who have served for forty years perhaps receive $4,000 per annum. Some of these men have served their country for forty years, a part of the time, perhaps, at $1,200 a year; in fact, twenty-five years ago lieutenants served in the Army for $50 per month, or $600 per annum. I served for $600 per annum in the Army years ago, when that was the pay of second lieutenants, or within a fraction of it. These profespay of second neutenants, or within a fraction of it. I fless professors have served a long time in the Army, perhaps some of them with large families, who are well qualified to be instructors at West Point, to teach the various branches, to drill the soldiers, to teach them to be officers, to teach them to take charge of men, to understand men, how to control men, how to guide men, and how to make all the movements that are necessary in military affairs, to say nothing of the other duties to the Government and the country which they are required to perform in engineering and other matters; and I ask the Senator where he will find persons well calculated to act as instructors for a less price? If you give a less price, I should say, if I were an instructor at West Point, that I would desire to be relieved and to return to the Army again. These men have nearly all come out of the Army. One of the best instructors at the Military Academy—no, I will not say the best, but really as good as we have ever hadwho was there but a short time ago, prepared the new tactics that are being used now by the Army, entirely a different drill, one that is simple, that all can understand very easily, so that the movements of the infantry, the cavalry, and the artillery are all the same, when heretofore they had always been different. This instructor, General Upton, was a colonel in the Army, and he went to West Point because he was one of the best qualified men in the Army for giving instruction in reference to military tactics. He was willing to go there and instruct the cadets in the movements of the Army because he was a competent man well capital.

instruct the cadets in the movements of the Army because he was a competent man, well qualified, a good soldier, a man who, as colonel in the Army, could receive the same pay.

New, I do here protest against the Appropriation Committees, either in reference to West Point or in reference to the Army generally, or in reference to anything else that depends on general laws on our statute-books, making laws for us in the appropriation bills except to appropriate the money that is necessary to be appropriated under existing statutes. Whenever we permit the Appropriation Committees to provide statutory laws for us, outside of that which they are required to do by the laws as they exist, by means of appropriations, we may as well form ourselves into an appropriation committee, and have all the statutes mixed up with clauses appropriating tee, and have all the statutes mixed up with clauses appropriating $500 for so and so, and having in the appropriation bills sections declaring "be it enacted, that if any person shall cut timber on land belonging to the Government, he shall be fined and imprisoned." That is about the way your statutes will read: a provision in one section for an appropriation of money, a provision in another fixing a penalty for the violation of some law. A proposition to bring upon us such a condition of things in legislation ought to be ignored and scouted from the highest deliberative body in this nation. The Appropriation Committees should bring in appropriation bills providing the money under the law that they are required to do, and let the two Houses act upon them, and leave the general laws to be enacted by the Congress of the United States, after being reported by the appropriate committees that have the right to pass upon these laws and report amendments or modifications.

For these reasons I am in favor of the amendments that have been reported by the Appropriation Committee, inasmuch as they are amendments germane to this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have but a word or two in reply to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Logan.] I shall not follow him in his wanderings outside of the direct point at issue between us in this debate. Nor shall I imitate his example and be led into any discussion of what constitutes the proper scale of compensation to officers or solwhat constitutes the proper scale of compensation to officers or soldiers in war or in peace; still less into the quality or quantity of quarters or of tents, of rations, or other requirements of the camp. Important as all these inquiries are, they do not elucidate the propriety of the pending amendment. They are not before the Senate. If they were, I would surrender my little information, or all that I can ever hope to acquire, to my friend from Illinois, who has had so large and so distinguished an experience on all these subjects, both in peace and in war. But the topic will become the subject-matter of legitimate discussion when the Army bill is properly before us.

The solitary question before us is: Can the Senate justly and properly reduce the salaries of the nine professors at the Military Academy at West Point, as proposed by the bill of the House of Representatives? That is the solitary question now before the Senate. I sentatives? That is the solitary question now before the Senate. I sentatives? That is the solitary question now before the Senate. I know, Mr. President, that it is always an ungracious duty to reduce the salaries of any meritorious official. We shrink from it. But, when in the discharge of official duty I am required to pass upon any proposed measure of retrenchment, demanded by the stringency of the times, I can only seek with all the light and argument before me, to exercise an upright and impartial judgment. No Senator can deny that every possible reduction in public expenditures which the public interest will justify ought sternly to be insisted upon and promptly carried out. Never has there been of late years greater pecuniary embarrassment than that which now pervades every section of our country. The great industrial industries of the country are paralyzed and the people are burdened with onerous taxation. Where shall we begin this work of reduced expenditure? I reply, in every shall we begin this work of reduced expenditure? I reply, in every branch of the public service where the public interest will permit it. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan] asks me if I would have the professors at West Point to go without a house? Certainly not, the professors at West Point to go without a house? Certainly not, nor without fuel, schools, or medical attendance. I would have the Government to furnish everything that is furnished now, both to the professors and to the cadets, and more, if the interest of the academy demanded it. But in estimating the salaries to be paid to these professors annually, I would take into account whatever was gratuitously furnished them by the Government, and which, but for such gratuity, they would be compelled to pay for out of their salaries. Is not this a just estimate in fixing the compensation to professional or to manual labor everywhere? Is not such a standard just and conitable? equitable?

The United States furnishes each of these nine professors with a house; but if the United States did not furnish them with a house, would they not be compelled to pay the rent of it out of their annual compensation? So, too, with fuel, medical attendance, and schools, all furnished gratuitously by the Government in addition to their salaries; are they not to be considered in fixing the salaries of these professors? Are they not perquisites, part and parcel of the compensation to the professors? If not, why not? The Senator from Illinois argues that because the United States owns the buildings ocprofessors? Are they not perquisites, part and parcel of the compensation to the professors? If not, why not? The Senator from Illinois argues that because the United States owns the buildings occupied by these professors such occupancy is not a legitimate item in estimating their annual compensation. How about the fuel or the schools? They are paid for by the Government. Still the Senator argues against both as estimates in the amount of the professors' sal-

Mr. President, I had supposed that all valuable perquisites, either to a public or to a private position, entered into the estimate of the amount of salary of the incumbent who filled it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator a question. It is very hard to say that we ought not to consider the perquisites that a person receives; but I will ask whether or not, when a soldier is in the field at $11 a month, and you board him—that is, you give him his food and raiment—the Senator will take into consideration the value of the tent that covers that soldier in fixing the salary he shall receive while fighting covers that soldier in fixing the salary he shall receive while ngnung for his country? Is that the proposition?

Mr. STEVENSON. When we come under the Army appropriation bill to discuss the pay and emoluments of soldiers in the Army, the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois will be entirely pertinent and proper. It will be time enough to answer it then. It is out of place now. We are dealing with professors now, not soldiers. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." Do not let us evade or get away from the direct question involved. We are discussing the propriety of reducing the pay of professors at West Point. cussing the propriety of reducing the pay of professors at West Point, and not of soldiers. Can the proposed reduction be made without injury to the public interest? Are valuable perquisites furnished by the Government to the professors to be estimated in fixing these salaries ?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator, perhaps, does not use the term "soldier" as I do. He makes a distinction, perhaps, between an officer and a soldier. I do not. When I speak of a soldier, I embrace an officer as well as a private in that language. I mean by a soldier a man who belongs to the Army. Some have official robes and others have not; but they are all soldiers, and there is no country in the world, as I said, which does not provide shelter for its soldiers. Some provide better than others do. I only ask the Senator whether he will, in providing for an army, take into consideration the shelter that is furnished to that army, in fixing their pay, and when they are that is furnished to that army, in fixing their pay, and when they are subject to be transferred from one place to another any day?

Mr. STEVENSON. Still, Mr. President, the Senator propounds interrogatories that are not pertinent to the issue involved. His question is not germane to this debate. We are not now discussing the pay or perquisites either of officers or of soldiers of the United States Army. The professors at West Point are not in that sense officers. They are like other professors, and have only an assimilated rank. The similated rank. ple question is, in estimating their salary shall we take into the account the house-rent, fuel, schools furnished and paid for by the Government as increasing the moneyed compensation paid to these professors annually? That is the sole and only question involved. And the question propounded to me by the Senator from Illinois, I submit, does not in any way tend to elucidate its solution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I do not interrupt my honorable friend on this point, I will remove the difficulty perhaps by saying that these professors are of the Army of the United States.

Mr. WEST. They are professors of military law.

Mr. WESL. They are processors of mintary law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They are all colonels and lieutenantcolonels of the Army; and I think this debate is going on upon an entire misapprehension of what the committee has done and what, I think my honorable friend from Kentucky will agree, it ought to have

Mr. LOGAN. West Point is part of the Army to-day under the statutes

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to show the composition of the Army of the United States by the Revised Statutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. What page does my honorable friend read from?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Page 202:

The Army of the United States shall consist of— One General; One Lieutenant-General—

The statute goes on to enumerate the different branches, and then it reads: And the professors and corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy.

So that these professors are of the Army of the United States. If I do not interrupt my honorable friend I will say one word more. The act of 1870 undertook to fix the pay of the Army of the United States, including the professors of the Military Academy; so that the professors stand in the same rank and in the same relation as to pay. This bill comes from the House of Representatives and deals with the pay of one class in the Army. The committee therefore naturally say that is interfering with the compensation of the Army, and that when the subject of dealing with the pay of the Army comes up it is a proper consideration for the Senate or for the other branch. It did not seem to the committee to be a proper thing to select one class of officers belonging to the Army and undertake to fix their compensation while the general subject of compensation of the whole Army was not under consideration. That was the view the committee took of it.

Academy appropriation bill from increasing or reducing their salaries? Do we not often increase the salary of a particular judge without interfering with the salaries of the other Federal judges throughout the country? For very many years the Military Academy bill has been considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the House and of the Senate as a separate, independent bill, and I never heard their right to do so questioned. Their power to increase or reduce salaries was never until now thought to be affected by the fact of whether the professors at the Military Academy were officers of the Army or not. So far as my limited experience for four years on the Senate Appropriation Committee enables me to speak, I say, without fear of contradiction from any quarter, that the Military Academy bill has always been separately considered as an independent bill, wholly distinct from the bill for the support of the Army. I do not understand the argument, nor can I perceive its force, that, were it admitted that the professors at West Point were officers, the Committee on Appropriations in either the House or the Senate could not on the Military Academy bill increase or reduce the salaries of the pro-fessors, or increase or reduce the salary of a particular professor. I deny that these professors at the Military Academy are officers of the regular Army; but, if they were, the Committee on Appropriations can, on the pending bill, either raise or reduce their salaries.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the proposition. The Senator certainly misunderstood me as I stated it. I said, and I repeat, that Congress has no right to change the amount appropriated to pay these officers without repealing the act fixing their salaries. That is the proposition, and nobody has attempted to bring in such a repeal.

Mr. STEVENSON. We can very easily repeal any existing statute inconsistent with or antagonistic to the provisions of the pending bill when we shall have agreed on its provisions. Our constant practice in passing bills is to add a clause repealing all laws inconsistent with the pending enactment. There is no difficulty, if we vote down the pending amendment and adhere to the reduction of salaries contained in the House bill, to add any provision making such legislation harmonious with existing statutes touching the Army. There is nothing in the supposed objection of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the proposed reduction as violating existing statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will answer any question of the Senator with

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the judgment of the Senator from Kentucky whether he thinks $3,500, with the quarters and other things that are allowed to these professors, is an excessive compensa-tion to men whose duty it is to teach the higher mathematics and sciences to the young men who are to become the future engineers and officers of the Army of the United States? If he thinks it is an excessive compensation, then I admit his argument is a good one; but, if it is not excessive, then why seek to reduce it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad to answer all these questions one at a time. In reply to the Senator from Iowa, allow me to say that I do not think the Government ought ever to pay excessive salaries in any department of its multiplied agencies. I think Congress ought to department of its multiplied agencies. I think Congress ought to pay fair and just salaries. That I think has been done in this bill. When you test the salary paid to the professorships at West Point, even after the reduction proposed by the House bill, by salaries paid to equally competent professors in other colleges, I am sure the salaries at the Military Academy will exceed them. I speak of the average of our American colleges. There may be richly endowed institutions which may be exceptions. If you will take the professorships of the University of Virginia, or of the Washington and Lee University, in the same State, several distinguished and ancient colleges of New England I venture the opinion without pretaining to an expect in form. land, I venture the opinion, without pretending to any exact information on the subject, that you will find very few professors at these several colleges who receive four or five thousand dollars a year. I know distinguished scholars, highly cultivated in languages and science, men qualified not only to teach mathematics in its higher branches, but in its superlatively exalted grade of mixed mathematics, the very acme of mathematical science, and not generally taught in all of our colleges, who do not receive a salary of more than thirty-five hundred or four thousand dollars a year, and who are regarded as receiving a

Why in times like these should the professors at the Military Academy at West Point, distinguished as they are, receive more than similar professional talent of equal distinction is commanding elsewhere in American universities? Our constituents will demand and are entitled to have an answer to this question. It is a pertinent one. Why give to professors at the United States Military Academy larger salaries than are paid to equally able professors at other prominent and distinguished American colleges.

It will be no answer to the question to say that the Senate and

It will be no answer to the question to say that the Senate and House could not make the reduction on the Military Academy appro-It would be a still less satisfactory answer to say that such a reduction would be in violation of some existing law. No,

Mr. President, such excuses afford no pretext for refusing to concur with the House of Representatives in this proposed reduction.

I rose without the least intention of participating in this debate. I feel that I should perhaps not have done so without some examination into its details. I had supposed, however, that the discussion of the committee's amendment would lead to a mere interchange of views among Senators as to what reduction might be made without public or individual detriment. I had no conception that the proposed reduction would meet with such opposition. My past course in the Senate and my actions as a member of the Committee on Appropriations will attest that I have never been niggardly in my votes for appropriations, whether by way of salaries or otherwise, if constifor appropriations, whether by way of salaries or otherwise, if consti-tutional and proper. I hope never to be unjust in any proper ap-propriations to either the professors, or to the cadets at West Point, or to the academy itself in all its reasonable requirements. But, while this is true, I am for a just and reasonable reduction of public expenditures. I do not wish to be extravagant nor do I wish to be unjustly parsimonious—I would seek the golden mean between these two extremes. That I think the House of Representatives has ac-complished in this particular item of reduction. I regret that the Senators who oppose it feel it their duty to do so. Senators who oppose it feel it their duty to do so.

Now I come back to the objection of the Senator from Illinois, that these professors are Army officers and that the House of Representatives as well as the Senate are forbidden to reduce salaries of professors on an appropriation bill for this academy; it is in violation of existing law. I have already given an answer that we can repeal any such opposing statutes. I deny that these professors at West Point are Army officers in the sense contended for by Senators on the other side. Here is the enactment:

That the professors of the United States Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel; and the instructors of ordnance and science of gunnery and of practical engineering shall have the pay and allowances of major; and hereafter there shall be allowed and paid to the said professors 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years service in the Army and at the academy: Provided, That such addition shall in no case exceed 40 per cent. of said yearly pay; and said professors are hereby placed upon the same footing, as regards restrictions upon pay and retirement from active service, as officers of the Army.

The pay and allowances to these professors on the basis of Army officers do not make them officers. If it did it would not preclude the Committee of Appropriations from increasing or abolishing them. Indeed it has been the constant usage of appropriation bills to do so. Admit that the Military Academy is a part of the Army in its enlarged Appropriations for it have, after many years, been by separate Salaries have been increased and diminished by this committee. The course of instruction has been changed even by this very com-

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I do not believe that the power to repeal should be exercised in this way.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not understand the position of the Senator from Illinois. He desired to bring to my attention the simple fact that the repeal fixing the salary had not been enacted. Now, as I understand him, he objects on another distinct ground.

Mr. LOGAN. I objected that the House had passed the bill without repealing the act providing the salary.

Mr. STEVENSON. So I understood.

Mr. LOGAN. Therefore it was a power they could not exercise legally, that is, without leaving still a debt due from the Government to the party injured by a reduction of the salary. That is the point.

of course it can be done, but I was arguing against the propriety of doing it on an appropriation bill; and I insist upon that.

Mr. STEVENSON. The objection of the Senator is without availability. The passage of this bill by the House of Representatives reducing the salaries of these professors was a repeal pro tanto. These professors can only draw what is appropriated. But going to this technical objection insisted on by the Senator, we can repeal the law fixing the salary by an amendment to this bill. So, after all, the sole question is whether, after the reduction proposed by the House of Representatives, these professors receive a sufficient and just compensation. Looking to the eminent character of these nine professors—their talents and experience—four or five thousand a year, including the perquisites referred to, is a just and fair remuneration. I think so, looking to the exigency of the times and the necessity for retrenchment.

That problem should be easily solved. I have endeavored to show that the salaries provided for by the House bill to these nine professors are just and liberal in comparison with the salaries paid to professors at military schools and colleges throughout the country. strongly insist that because these professors are quasi United States officers, if you please, they are still professors engaged in scientific and military instruction in a Military Academy supported by the Government of the United States, and should receive no higher compensation than instructors of equal merit in similar institutions. The fact that it is a United States academy constitutes no reason for an increase of the professors' salaries beyond that which is given to professors of similar rank in other institutions.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I am credibly informed, and so believe, that the salaries of the professors of Columbia College, New York, have been ecently increased from $6,000 to $7,500.

Mr. STEVENSON. Perhaps that is true. If so, it is an exception to the almost universal rule. Colleges highly endowed like the one founded by Girard in Philadelphia, or more recently the one founded by Hopkins in Baltimore, no doubt give high salaries. I have no information of what the salaries are, but they constitute exceptions.

The people of this country, I am sure, would not justify Congress in fixing the salaries of West Point upon a basis greatly exceeding in amount the salaries paid to the professors in four-fifths of all the American colleges, universities, and military schools of the United States.

I have no feeling whatever in the matter. I desire to be just, but not profuse. If I could be persuaded that the salaries, given by the House bill to these nine professors, were not fully up and even over the standard of compensation given to professors generally, I should willingly vote to increase them. Unable with the lights before me to reach that conclusion, I shall vote against the proposed increase offered by the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no doubt that Congress can, on an appropriation bill, transact all the legislation of the country, because they can add to the bill: "Be it enacted that all legislation inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed." But I confess that I am surprised that any one should insist that it is within the legitimate province of an Appropriation Committee to determine whether we shall or shall not have a navy, an army, a military institution, river and harbor improvements, a judiciary, post-offices, custom-houses; because, if it is true that this is the legitimate province of an Appropriation Committee, they can determine all these questions. Of course the action of the committee requires the sanction of Congress afterward; but they absorb all other committees if the doctrine of the Senator from Kentucky is true that all you have to do is to let the Appropriation Committee strike down any institution that depends upon an appropriation. Of course that would end all legislation of Congress so far as all other committees are concerned. These committees are institutions. They are valuable institutions to the country; they decide more questions than any of our courts. They have an organization. They have power to bring witnesses. They are recognized by the country as valuable tribunals primarily to investigate subjects; and I protest that it is not the business of an Appropriation Committee to do any such thing. Their business is to make the appropriations which the laws require, and Congress makes those laws after being instructed by the committees who are specially put in charge of the different branches of this Government.

As to this compensation being too much, and that is the question, I will state that in New Jersey the compensation of professors, I think, ranges from about $3,500 to $5,000, some of them with dwellings and some without. But we have settled that this compensation is not too much, because it is exactly the compensation that we give the officers of the Army to whose rank these officers of the Army are assimilated. This institution is a part of the Army, and we have settled that this compensation is not too much. That is the law, and it must remain the law until we change it.

The only argument that I have heard in favor of the original measure is that the House of Representatives have reduced the amount. If I understand the organization of the legislative department of this country, the purpose is that legislation shall pass two separate Houses, shall have the guard and the check of being deliberated upon twice; and it ought to be out of order to use as an argument in this Chamber what has transpired in the other branch of the legislative department, because it is essential that our legislation should be distinct in order to maintain this double deliberation.

As to the idea that the people demand this reduction, let me say that the people of this nation have yet in too fresh memory the valuable services that West Point rendered this country to want us to commence a reduction there; and I have been glad to hear the Senator from Texas bear his tribute to the value of this institution, and glad that it was seconded by a volunteer officer who is not without military renown.

Mr. STEVENSON. I somewhat wonder at the statements of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] and therefore we are equally surprised at the respective positions taken by us. I should like to ask that Senator whether the salaries of West Point have not been reduced and increased correlatively and repeatedly by the Committee on Appropriations within a few years past? If he can prove to me that such has not been the practice and usage of this committee for several years past in both Houses of Congress, and when his party friends were in the ascendant, then I will confess myself wholly mistaken. Such is my information. Such is my experience of the practice of this committee. Indeed I may safely say that all the increase in official salaries and all the reduction therein have come invariably from the Committee on Appropriations. I do not think that the Senator ought therefore to be very much astonished at the position of those of us who favor the proposed reduction of salaries in the House bill.

I have a word or two to add on the subject of the sufficiency of these salaries after the reduction proposed by the House bill. I am glad to have some of my statements verified.

Since I was up before, a distinguished professor of one among the well-established colleges of high repute in New England called me out and gave me some valuable information on this subject, for which I am very grateful. It will interest the Senate because it directly elucidates one of my positions. I understand from the gentleman that at Yale the professors receive $3,000 per annum; at Harvard they receive $3,500; while at Amherst College the professors only receive $2,500. No Senator will question the acknowledged ability of the professors I have named, and still less the high grade of scholarship which marks these honored institutions.

How far do the compensations proposed by the House bill to the professors at West Point exceed those including perquisites? Mr. President, I must confess my surprise at the modest mode of argument by which it is sought to defeat this proposed reduction in this bill. It is not attempted to be shown that the reduction is unjust, but the argument is we cannot make it without violating some existing law. If I am not mistaken, the Committee of Appropriations proposed a few years since by some amendment to abolish one professorship and establish another. That would be strange legislation, if the professor had been, as is now claimed, an officer of the Army. I am content to make the issue on this proposed retrenchment, and to go before the people upon the question of increased or reduced expenditures.

This is the time and this is the place to begin reduction in expenditures. The House has done well; the Senate takes the responsibility of non-concurrence. I believe the reduction can be made without injury to the academy or injustice to the professors. I have given the basis of my faith and the comparison with the salaries paid to other professors in similar institutions. I acknowledge the value of this Military Academy to the country. It is a popular school, which I hope may be perpetuated; but if Congress continues salaries exceeding in amount those given in other institutions of this country, you strike, Senators, the first blow which I fear is ultimately to destroy it. The people are determined that unnecessary expenditures in every Department of the Government shall cease.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if the bill as reported to the Senate gives to these professors one farthing more than they have heretofore received; if it is an increase of their usual pay by one cent?

Mr. STEVENSON. But these salaries were fixed when the means and mode of living were much higher and more extravagant than now; and as we recede from war prices and reach a cheaper level salaries should undergo some reduction.

Mr. WEST. They were fixed in 1873.

Mr. STEVENSON. The argument is as unsound as it is illogical to say that the House of Representatives in the proposed reduction is striking a blow at the Military Academy at West Point. Is the proposed reduction of the salary of the President of the United States from $50,000 to $25,000 striking at or degrading the high office itself? Is that a sound argument? Remember that the Constitution gives to the popular branch of Congress the exclusive power of raising revenue and withheld it from the Senate. The Senator from Illinois

Mr. LOGAN. This is not raising revenue; it is disbursing revenue. Mr. STEVENSON. I know this bill disburses. But increased disbursements require increased revenue. Increased revenue requires increased taxation. Disbursement and taxation go hand in hand. All these appropriation bills originate in the House; they have been well considered there; they have been discussed there, and unless the Senate committee give strong reasons why the sums fixed by the House should not be reduced I must oppose the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me—
Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly; I will allow any one to enlighten me.
Mr. LOGAN. I do not refer to the House at all, because it would be improper to do so; but I heard a discussion on this bill; and when the Senator speaks about a bill being well considered and well discussed, it is very amusing to a man who heard a discussion on it once, where no man on the committee could tell whether there was a band in the Army of the United States or not, except at West Point. Some of them said there were bands all over the Army. A man who knows anything about military affairs knows that there is but one band in the United States belonging to the Army, and that is at West Point.
They struck out the appropriation for the Military Academy band, because they supposed there were bands all over the country belonging to the Army. Does the Senator call that discussing a bill by men who understand it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not intend to refer to the other House.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not intend to refer to the other House.
Mr. LOGAN. I do not refer to the other House, because I refer as much probably to a caucus as I do to Congress; but I heard that discussion, no matter where. I could not ascertain whether any man who was discussing it knew how many bands belonged to the Army of the United States, and I thought a man who did not know that was very illy prepared to determine what the appropriations should be for the Military Academy at West Point.
Mr. STEVENSON. I think if the bill strikes out all appropriations

Mr. STEVENSON. I think if the bill strikes out all appropriations for a band at West Point, I may go with the Senator from Illinois when we get to that appropriation. I am in favor of good martial music at West Point and other garrisons, but just now we are on the reduction of the pay of the professors. Let us dispose of one amendment at a time. When we come to the band's appropriation we will examine and discuss it upon its merits. The sole question of whether $3,500, with free rent, free fuel, and free schools, amounting to something like forty-five hundred dollars is sufficient compensation for a professor at West Point. I have shown that this sum greatly exceeds the compensation paid to professors in most of the universities and colleges of the United States, and I submit it to the Senate whether in view of this fact we should not concur in the reduction proposed by the House.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Kentucky asked me whether I was not aware that there was a precedent for this legislation. I am not aware there is any precedent for it. I do not believe there is. I do not believe that ever before has an appropriation committee undertaken primarily to act on the question of reducing the salary or the remuneration of the officers of the United States Army. If my friend has any precedent I should like to see him produce it. I think that this is an anomalous case, and if there is any precedent for it the sooner it is stopped the better, because it is perfectly manifest that the Committee on Appropriations, according to the doctrine insisted upon, could absorb the consideration of every question that comes before Congress.

My friend thinks that this compensation is too much. It amounts to about $4,000. These are men who have families to support, who spend years in preparing themselves for the work; men of superior spend, years in preparing themselves for the work; men of superior ability. We work six months one year and three months another; they work the whole twelve months in each year. We do not think $5,000 any too much for ourselves. I do not think $3,500 or $4,000 for men who work twice the length of time is too much for them; because I am free to admit, so far as I am concerned, that they are more than my peers in information, in qualifications for usefulness, and in the great service that they have rendered and are rendering to their country.

Mr. WEST obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to reply to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am informed by the Committee on Appropriations that it has been the universal custom of that committee to reduce these expenditures.

Mr. SARGENT. By the Committee on Appropriations?
Mr. STEVENSON. By one member of it.
Mr. LOGAN. To reduce the pay of the Army?
Mr. STEVENSON. Not the pay of the Army. I am talking about these professors. Do not fly off. Stick to the text. Stick to the argument.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want my friend from Kentucky to fly off. He is inclined to leave the argument. If I understand the law read by the Senator from Maine, it was that this institution at West Point was a part of the Army of the United States, and that these professors were assimilated in their rank to the rank of colonels in the Army of the United States. If this committee has the right to reduce the compensation of this branch of the Army, it has a right to reduce that of any other portion of the Army, the generals and the colonels, and that has never been done in this way.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will just say from my own knowledge, from my own experience, that the West Point bill has been a separate bill and has been referred to the Appropriation Committee ever since I have been in the Senate. The Senator from New Jersey now is delivering a lecture to the popular branch as well as to this, that they have for so many long years been in error, that they have been usurp ing a power they never possessed, and that now is the time to stop it. ing a power they never possessed, and that now is the time to stop it. I am for sticking to old precedents until I know that there has been some violation of law. He says I have not stuck to the text. I have strictly confined myself to the question whether this was legitimate pay for these professors. I have been interrupted by illustrations of the Army, and of this, and of that, and of the othor thing, but I say just let us come down to the point: Is $3,500 a fair average, or is $3,000, including house and fuel? If it is not, give me the example; show me where; show me how., When you come to look at the other universities and colleges you will find that the average is below rather than above. than above.

Mr. WEST. I think that is a proposition which the Senate ought to consider. It is not worth while for us to discuss our power upon an appropriation bill, because we have manifested it on various occa sions here to insert general legislation. I take the Senator on his own proposition, and I ask his attention for a moment to what I say. When proposition, and I ask his attention for a moment to what I say. He said that the professors at Harvard were paid $3,500; that the professors at Yale were paid $3,000; that the professors at Amherst were paid $2,5(0; and that that was a criterion for us to go by.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not think it was a criterion to go by; I only said it was an illustration.

Mr. WEST. Very well; then let us take it as an illustration. Now let me ask the Senator whether he is willing to pay the professors at West Point $3,000 a year?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am willing to pay what this bill provides as it came from the House.

Mr. WEST. This bill does not provide that. There are twenty Mr. WEST. This bill does not provide that. There are twenty professors in that academy whom you have not touched; and every one of them is paid less than $3,000. If you look at the schedule of officers on duty at West Point you will find that there are eight specified professors who are paid $3,500 and $3,000 respectively, but there are twenty other professors there who are paid from $3,000 down to $1,500 a year. Therefore if you take the average of the pay of professors at West Point it is nowhere near what it is at Amherst.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator from Louisiana mean professors or

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator from Louisiana mean professors or assistant professors ?

Mr. WEST. You can call them anything you please; they are pro-

Mr. DAVIS. I mean what the law calls them.
Mr. WEST. They are giving their services as professors for the education of youth. There are some thirty of them, and if you take the average of them they will come down to the Senator's schedule of $2,500 paid to the Amherst professors.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that there are but nine professors at West Point. There are a number of assistant professors and teachers there, and I understand that the amendment provides for additional pay for all of them.

Mr. WEST. We will come to that in time. Let me ask the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Kentucky, are there not assistant professors at Amherst or at Yale?

Mr. STEVENSON. I presume there are. I do not know.

Mr. WEST. I presume not. I presume they are all classed as professors. Take the scale of prices, and apply it to them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This debate is growing rather desultory, and I ask that the fourth rule of the Senate be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

4. No Senator shall speak more than twice, in any one debate, on the same day, without leave of the Senate, which question shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In this connection the Chair will ask the Secretary to read rule 3.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Every Senator, when he speaks, shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the President will insist upon each Senator addressing the Chair. I try to do it uniformly, and I shall be glad if he calls those to order who do not observe the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that he has called the attention of Senators already to it, and it is a delicate thing to remind them the second time. He has now had the rule read, and if it is the wish of the Senate-and he takes it for granted-he will enforce the rule.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations objects to my replying to the assaults that have been made on the amendment of the committee, I shall say no more.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; because the Senator from Louisiana is a member of the Committee on Appropriations—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds the Senator from Maine that he will address the Chair.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I owe an apology to my honorable friend from Louisiana, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I took occasion, not by way of rebuke to him but by way of suggestion to the Senate, to state that the rules had not been complied with in this debate. I cannot tell how many times some Senators have been up, but as the debate is getting so desultory and we are consuming so much time on the subject, I supposed that my honorable friend would be willing that I should admonish the Senate through him that the rules were not quite complied with. I beg pardon of my friend for interrupting him.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, this debate embraces a point outside of the particular features of this bill. It is an attitude assumed by one party here, and we all understand it well, by arraigning the party that he have described in the Covernment. that has been administering the Government for some years upon the score of extravagance. I understand that. I recognize their right to do it; and I am quite willing to go hand in hand with any member of that party in endeavoring to retrench the expenditures of the Government; but I do not believe in any political clap-trap that would hold us responsible for disbursements and extravagance unless they can cite instances and give us facts showing where extravagance has been indulged in.

I come right to the point made by the Senator from Kentucky, that the Government of the United States is to-day paying in the Military Academy of the Government higher compensation than is given in the private civil institutions of the country. I take issue with him on that proposition; and I will show by this bill and by the law that out of thirty professors at West Point the average is under $3,000 per graphy. You may call them anything you please, assistant professors out of thirty professors at West Point the average is under $3,000 per annum. You may call them anything you please, assistant professors or whatever any one thinks they are. No higher price is paid in the Military Academy of the United States than is paid in private institutions throughout the country. That cannot be denied upon the facts. Let us take the particular instances where men are paid in excess. Who are they? There are four professors there paid $3,500 a year. That is the Harvard price. But they are paid 10 per cent. for longevity of service for every term of five years. Who are these professors and what independence do they possess in their present position so that if their pay is cut down they can seek some other position, so that if their pay is cut down they can seek some other means of livelihood? They have all, with the exception of one man there, I believe, been raised in the Army. They have all given the best years of their life to the service of their country. They are not like the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professors at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at the professor at the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions, who can leave their particular the professor at your civil institutions. ticular pursuit and immediately adopt the profession of the law, which is their inherent one in almost all instances; but they are men worn out, as it were, in the service of the country and fit for nothing else. Of those few men only four of them, in consideration of their long service and in consideration of the fact that they have rendered themselves incompetent to earn their living elsewhere and are most valuable there and cannot be replaced, the Government of the United States absolutely proposes to expend $3,000 a year on them. That is all there is to it

It was scarcely necessary to say that this is not in accordance with the salaries paid in civil institutions. Certainly the facts refute the Senator. The West Point professors, I repeat again, are paid under $3,000 a year. Yale pays that; Amherst pays nearly that; Harvard Yet we are to be accused of extravagance here in one of the military institutions of the country! Take the gentleman on his own proposition and he has nothing to stand upon. There is no unwarranted extravagance there, and there is no extravagance or any scale of compensation that does not accord with all the proper institutions of similar rank throughout the country. Again, professors in other schools have the opportunity, if their compensation does not suit them, to leave, but in this case they cannot do it. They are unfitted to earn their living elsewhere. They are an honor to the country, and the institution is an honor to the country, as every Senator knows.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not desire to detain the Senate for any long period of time. Mr. COCKRELL. Will the gentleman yield until I ask the Senator from Louisiana one question?

Mr SAULSBURV. I prefer while I am on the floor to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware declines to yield.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not care to yield. It may lead to discus-

The proposition of the House of Representatives is to pay the professors, nine in number, four of them $3,500 each and five of them $3,000 each. The Appropriation Committee of the Senate have seen $3,000 each. The Appropriation Committee of the School proper to propose an amendment to pay, in addition to the pay propose these pine professors nearly $800 apiece. That vided by the House, these nine professors nearly $800 apiece. That is, four of these professors, if the amendment prevails, would have in ash payment $4,300 and five of them would have $3,800. That is the proposition now before the Senate. The question is, shall we act upon the suggestion of the House or act upon that proposed by the committee? It is simply a question of economy that is presented, but learned Senators on the other side in this debate have seen proper to seek to change the issue. The Senator from New Jersey, who is an able lawyer, as well as the Senator from Illinois, also a distinguished lawyer, seeks to change the issue presented by the bill and the amendment to the question as to the competency of an Appropriation Committee to change the law fixing their compensation. That is the issue which they desire to be presented in this case. It is foreign to the real issue; but if I saw proper to join issue with the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Illinois as to the competency of an Appropriation Committee to vary the compensacompetency of an Appropriation Committee to vary the compensa-tions which have been provided by law I need not cite many instances to establish the right of the committee so to do. Do we not know that the compensation of men in the civil service has been repeat-edly changed upon an appropriation bill? It has only been a few years since you raised the salary of the President of the United States from $25,000 to $50,000 upon an appropriation bill; and it has only been a few years since you raised the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court upon an appropriation bill, and many other instances might be given in which the compensation of Government officers and employés has been changed on appropriation bills.

and employés has been changed on appropriation bills.

But I do not mean to be diverted from the real issue presented by this bill and by the amendment. I say again the issue presented is one of economy, of reduction of expenditures. That is the issue, and the people of this country will understand it. On this side of the Chamber we say that the expenses of this Government have been too large, and we propose to cut them down. Gentlemen upon the other side take issue upon that, but seek to divert us from the real issue by raising a false issue in this discussion. Is it not time that the expenses of the Government were reduced? What is the condition of your country to-day? With a country possessed of the natural elements of wealth, with a fertile soil, with a climate congenial to health, with the very bowels of the earth teeming with mineral wealth, what is the condition of the country to-day? The business of the country is prostrate, the industries of the country are languishing, the people of the country are being oppressed by onerous taxation; and when we hear their appeal for relief and seek to reduce the expenses of the Government we are met by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber who denythat there is any extravagance and thwart the efforts that are made for the relief of the people.

the efforts that are made for the relief of the people.

Let it go out before the country; let it be understood, as it will be understood, that on this side of the Chamber as well as in the other House of Congress there is a disposition to grant relief to the oppressed industries of this country, to relieve the people from taxation, but that we are met by opposition stern and determined that the people of this country shall still languish under oppressive taxation, and that the Treasury of this country shall be depleted to pay high salaries to professors in academies. I want this issue presented correctly before the people. We are in earnest. I would do no injustice to these professors, but my distinguished friend from Kentucky has demonstrated as clear as a sunbeam that they are better paid to-day than professors in ordinary institutions in this land. Yet with these facts staring us in the face, seeing as we do that these men are being paid far beyond the pay that is accorded to gentlemen in the same line of business, paid better than professors in most of the colleges of this country, we propose still to keep up an extravagant military establishment and oppose a reduction of the salaries of the professors, and propose to give them a large compensation.

Sir, I go for economy, not only in this particular but in everything, until the oppressed people of this country are relieved from the onerous burden of taxation which has too long oppressed them, and which has reduced many of them to absolute bankruptcy. I hope the Senate will not be indifferent to the appeals that the constantly made in the constantly made. will not be indifferent to the appeals that are constantly made. No longer than last evening I received a letter from the city of Boston, in which the writer, whom I do not know, detailed to me the wretched condition of many persons in that city. He told me that there were at least eight hundred people in that city who on that night, because they were out of employment, would be compelled to sleep upon naked boards, with no other clothing than that which they were in the day-time. We know that in every section of the country there is great distress. I live in an agricultural community, perhaps better off than many sections of the country, but I pick up the papers of my State and read advertisement after advertisement of sales by the shcriff of the county of the lands of my constituents; and I know that it is in part at least because there have been large draughts upon their industry and their earnings to replenish the public Treasury of this country. In the noble little State in which I live there have been in the last fifteen years not much less than $10,000,000 abstracted from the people and placed in the Treasury of the United States—an amount greater than all the expenses of the State government from the four letter of that government in 127% until the present time. the foundation of that government in 1776 until the present time. the foundation of that government in 1776 until the present time. In addition to that, it is more than all the railroads in the State have cost; it is more than all the churches in the State have cost; it is more than all the school-houses in the State have cost. When I remember the condition of the people of my State and know that the people of every section of the people of my State and know that the people of every section of this country are being oppressed by taxation in order that the public Treasury may be kept replenished, I am for reducing the expenses of this military establishment, for curtailing the salary which is paid to these professors; because I believe the compensation provided in the bill as it comes from the House ample for the services rendered by these gentlemen to the country.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not rise, Mr. President, to debate this bill at length; but it seems to me Senators have spoken quite harshly of the other House and put questions to the Senator from Kentucky as though it were a very novel thing to affect salaries in appropriation I do not mean to say that it is a wise thing to do, for I am opposed to it as a general principle. I think it is better to fix the salaries of officers by law, and then have the Appropriation Committee make the proper appropriations to carry out the law; but practice has prevailed to do otherwise, for years, I am sure. I ask attention to the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, found in the seventeenth volume of the Statutes at Large, and passed on the last day of the Congress then in existence. It is an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes. It was therethe year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes. It was therefore an appropriation bill for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, and I call attention to it, not as approving the manner of doing things but in order to say that the Senator from Kentucky was quite right, when he was questioned so sharply, in saying that it certainly had been the practice to raise and lower salaries in appropriation bills, and that it could be done in this. Surely it can. That was a general appropriation bill, reported from the Appropriation Committee and passed; and yet that is the bill which raised the salaries of a very large number of the officers of the which raised the salaries of a very large number of the officers of the United States. That is the bill which raised the salary of the President of the United States from $25,000 to $50,000, beginning the next day. That is the bill which raised the salary of the judges. That is the bill which increased the salary of the clerks of the Senate and of the clerks of the House; and that is the bill which raised the salaries of Members and Senators from two years previous, within a day, from $5,000 to $7,500. It declared the increase to take effect at the from $5,000 to $7,500. It declared the increase to take effect at the beginning of the Congress; and it was in its last twenty-four hours when it was passed, as the bill was approved on that day.

I do not allude to this to say that I approve the practice. I do not mean to say that I approve of doing what is sought to be done by this bill. Certainly we can do it by repealing the law; but I do say that it has been a practice which has prevailed here in years past, and that therefore there is no reason for dealing sharply with the other House when it has sought to follow that practice. other House when it has sought to follow that practice.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Will he not be candid enough to state that the people disapproved of that act?

Mr. KERNAN. It was not the manner that they disapproved; it was increasing the salaries from two years before that they disap-proved. I disapprove the manner, but the people did not bother about the manner. They were indignant about what was done in that appropriation bill, and I do not think the people would be indignant if in an appropriation bill now we should reduce salaries that we think are too large. That is all I mean to say. I do not mean to say now that these particular salaries are too large. I am not discussing that. I am not familiar enough with the subject to say whether these salaries are or are not too large. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this action of the other House is not unprecedented; and the instance which I have cited is not the only By looking back through the appropriation bills you will find that they have often been made the means of raising the salary of an officer when Congress thought it too low, and of diminishing it when they thought it too large.

I have only said thus much because I think if the other House is right, (and that is the real question to be discussed, and that the Senator from Kentucky wished to discuss,) as to which I express no opinion until I am better informed, in supposing that these salaries should be reduced, there is no trouble in, and there is abundant precedent for, reducing them in this bill; and in some respects I suppose it is thought most convenient. That is all I wish to say. I think the real question is the one to be looked at: whether these salaries should be reduced or not, and, if they should be, there is no trouble in doing it by this bill, and the action will be hailed by the people with delight when it reduces while they were indignant when they thought Congress unreasonably raised salaries.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky to be as to the propriety of an appropriation committee doing this thing. My argument with him was that if they could do it they would absorb the province of every other committee of the Senate and they could really take the whole legislation of the country into their hands. At that time, when discussing the matter with the Senator from Kentucky, I really thought that we could legally do it by putting in a provision that all inconsistent legislation was repealed; but since then, on conference with another Senator, who I hope will give his reason, it seems to me that it is illegal as

Mr. KERNAN. I will answer my friend. His suggestion, which he repeats, was a good one, and it weighs with me. I do not think it is a very good manner of legislation, and I did not allude to him in what I said, but I alluded to the fact that the Senator from Kentucky time and again had sought to meet the direct question. I do not want to discuss whether really we should reduce these salaries or not, but the Senator from Kentucky did discuss that precise question, and I thought he was answered, not by my friend from New Jersey, but by some of the Senators, (all kindly enough, to be sure,) as though he was in very great ignorance, as though this was an unprecedented thing, and the other House seemed to be rebuked for attempting in an appropriation bill to do it. I concur that it is not a wise way to legislate, as a general rule; and if we cure the evils of this precedent now we shall do a good work, but we shall be curing what it has been quite the practice of Congress to do.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely rise to suggest to the Senator that the question that arose between the Senator from Kentucky and myself (and I presume that is what he is alluding to) was an entirely different proposition from that which he states.

Mr. KERNAN. I may be mistaken about it, but I was listening attentively.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that the bill sent by the House to the Senate had and the the senate had reduced the appropriation for these salaries without any provision repealing the act providing for the salaries, and that they had no authority to do that. That was the proposition. I still maintain it, and I hope the Senator will not disagree with me about it.

Mr. KERNAN. I will not dispute it, but my friend from Kentucky answered "We can amend it by putting in that repeal if we conclude to do it"

Mr. LOGAN. And I answered that by saying that nobody had proposed any such amendment. It has not been done.

Mr. KERNAN. It may be done; but until we agree to reduce the salaries it will not be in order to put that in. After the Senate agrees to the change of salaries, such an amendment would be very proper, and would meet the whole objection.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, under the existing law—that is, under the act of February 28, 1873, which will be found in section 1336 of the Revised Statutes—it is provided that "each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels." There is also a proviso that "hereafter there shall be allowed and paid to the said professors 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years' service in the Army and at the academy," what is generally known as longevity pay.

It is quite apparent that this appropriation bill as it came from the House of Representatives intended merely to dispense with what is known as the increased or longevity pay provided for in that section. By reference to the Army Register it will be seen that there are four professors who have been in the academy more than twenty are four professors who have been in the academy more than twenty years; that there are five professors appointed since the 14th day of February, 1871. The House bill provides for the pay of four professors at $3,500; that is the pay of a colonel; and then for the pay of five professors at $3,000 per annum; that is giving to the five the pay of lieutenant-colonel, so that it is apparent that the House intended to provide only for the actual pay of professors having the rank of colonel and lieutenant-colonel, without regard to the increased pay for each term of service of five years. Now, the question arises here whether we can properly pass this appropriation bill when the salary of these professors is by the existing law greater than what the bill proposes to allow them. It seems at least questionable unless we further provide in the bill that the salary hereafter shall be only the pay of colonel or lieutenant-colonel without the longevity pay, and I think I shall propose this amendment:

That after June 30, 1876, the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel; and the instructors of ordnance, of science, of gunnery, and of practical engineering shall have the pay and allowances of majors; and said professors are hereby placed upon the same footing as regards retirement from active service as officers of the Army; and section 1336 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

It seems to me that such a clause would come in more properly as a second section, and having it in view to offer this amendment, when the amendments of the committee shall have been voted upon, I shall vote against the amendments as they are reported, with a view of offering as an amendment the section which I have just read. I will not offer it at this time, because the proper course is to pass upon the amendments of the committee first.

I have some regard to the voice of the Representatives of the peo-ple in the other House. They have, I have no doubt, maturely con-sidered this bill. It comes to us in a way that leads us to believe that they have examined it with care; and, for one, I am willing to conform to what their views are as to what shall be the salaries of the professors in the Military Academy. I think, taking them all in all, they will be, with this amendment, quite as high as those of the professors of the principal colleges of the country; and, that being the case, I will vote against the pending amendment of the committee with a view of offering the section I have just read.

There is another view of this matter, Mr. President, that leads me to come to this conclusion. The law and the amendment which I shall offer both provide that the pay of a professor shall be $3,000 shall offer both provide that the pay of a professor shall be $3,000 until he shall have served in that capacity for the period of ten years, and then it shall be increased $500. That, it strikes me, is a proper increase, and is really equivalent to what might be called the longevity pay of an officer. I have no doubt that we can increase or diminish in an appropriation bill the salary of any officer. We have done it heretofore; we certainly can do it now; but I think that the proper time to amend the bill will be after the committee's amendments have been acted on, when I shall offer this amendment. In case the committee's amendments are voted down, we can then in this way make the bill harmonious by repealing the old law and enacting the new.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I have no wish at all to delay a vote upon this amendment, and I had thought I would not say a word about it. Some propositions of law, however, have been stated here, and some constructions given to the statute, going not only to the question of power, but to the method of exercising that power, which I cannot concur in, and I wish to state very briefly the views I entertain on the question.

Upon our general statutes we have provisions for certain officers. These same general statutes provide that the compensation or salaries of those officers shall be so much. Such are the provisions of the general statutes. An office is created; it is filled, and the salary is fixed. I understand that the salary provided for these professors by the amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations is precisely what is provided for by the general statute, no more and no less. There is no provision whatever in this bill anywhere changing The salaries of these officers cannot be paid except existing statutes. as Congress provides for it in an appropriation bill, or in some way. That is to say, though by the general statute you have the office, and it is filled, and a provision that the officer shall have so much compensation, if you do not provide for his payment he does not draw his pay; he cannot. From year to year we in the appropriation bills make provision for the payment of these salaries. We say that there shall provision for the payment of these salaries. We say that there shall be appropriated so much to pay the members of Congress, to pay the professors at West Point, the officers of the Army, and to provide for the civil service. By this bill, as it came from the House of Repre-sentatives, it is provided that we shall pay these officers so much; not that their salaries shall be changed; not that there shall be any change in the existing statutes; but for this year we will appropriate so much toward their salaries. I submit that, when you have done that and stopped there, you have provided for paying those persons so much upon the salaries that they are entitled to under the general statutes, and leave the balance unpaid and unprovided for.

Now, suppose you attach a provision such as has been suggested here but not yet offered, "that all laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed," do you thereby reduce the salaries? Not at all. You do not touch the question of salaries; but you only say that so far as the provision you make for the payment of these officers for this year is concerned if there is anything in any other law inconsistent. far as the provision you make for the payment of these officers for this year is concerned, if there is anything in any other law inconsistent with this, it is repealed; but the law stands the same as to their compensation; you have not touched it. And I undertake to say that if the Government could be brought into court by these officers, the law standing in this way, the general law providing for their salary and fixing it, and we in this appropriation bill saying we will pay them so much this year, and then a provision that all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed—if they could go into court and sue for the balance of their salary, there is not a court on earth but what for the balance of their salary, there is not a court on earth but what would hold that they were entitled to such balance. Why? Because your provision "that all acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed" only goes to the question of payment for the year, and not at all to the general question of their compensation, which is provided by a general statute. It seems to me that on this question there can be no kind of doubt

I think some Senator gave the illustration a while ago of the compensation of Senators. Our salary is $5,000 a year. Suppose by an appropriation bill you provide for the payment of but $4,000, and then "all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed," you only affect the question of appropriation; you do not affect the question of conpensation by the general law by such legislation. And there is not a Senator on this floor but what would claim and insist, if there was any way by which he could reach the money, that he was entitled to the other $1,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose you just add "that all salaries not provided for hereby are repealed."

Mr. WRIGHT. There is no question but that you can reach it. There is no doubt about that; but I was arguing that you cannot do it in the manner here proposed thus far. The Senator asks if you cannot do it in some way. I grant it. It has been said here already that you can incorporate all the legislation of this Congress on an appropriation bill, if you wish to do so. You have the power to do it. There is no constitutional difficulty in the way of doing it; but is it wise and judicious?

Mr. President, allow me to say, before I conclude, what I have said heretofore, that if there is anything on earth that is vicious in our legislation, it is the incorporating on appropriation bills of legislation that has not anything to do with them. It has been the evil of legislation ever since I have been here, and almost for years and years before that time.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion in the line of his argument as to the impolicy of general legislation on appropriation bills? It occurred to me during the remarks of the Senator from New York that the act to which he referred, popularly known as "the salary-grab," could not have been passed probably but for the privileges that pertained to it as connected with an appropriation bill. It is well known that under our rules such bills have privileges that no other bills have. The effect of the passage of that bill has been to place the salaries of certain efficers of the Government in such a position that they cannot be respectively.

of the passage of that offin has been to place the salaries of certain officers of the Government in such a position that they cannot be reduced for a great length of time, if ever.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to refer to that as an illustration of the general remark that I had already made; but I have no disposition to continue the discussion, and if it is not objectionable to my colleague, who has this bill in charge, I will move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLICON I have any colleague will not proceed that rection

Mr. ALLISON. I hope my colleague will not press that motion until we take a vote upon this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Several SENATORS. O, no! let us have an executive session.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe I shall insist on my motion, as that seems to be the sense of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES rose.
Mr. WRIGHT. I withdraw the motion, with the understanding that the Senator from Massachusetts will renew it, or allow me to do so.

Mr. DAWES. Before this matter passes from the consideration of the Senate I desire to say a single word in reference to the case suggested by the Senator from New York. The Senator from New York has brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that in other appropriation bills salaries have been increased to a large amount, and has stated that it has been the custom not only to increase but to reduce salaries in appropriation bills. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about that matter, and the history of the rule under which that legislation was effected not only illustrates his mistake, but the mischief, and something more than the mischief, of the rule itself. Originally there was no power to introduce into an appropriation bill any independent legislation whatever; but in the course of time, in the year 1837 or 1838—the Senator from New York will know who had control of both Houses of Congress at that time—it became necessary, in the opinion of those who did have the control of Congress, to raise certain salaries. They could not carry through an independent measure raising those salaries, and therefore they sought to impose it upon an appropriation bill. In 1838, in Committee of the Whole, a motion was made to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government. The point was taken that that was independent legislation, and it was ruled that it was, and held to be out of order. In a day or two— I do not know but what it was the next day-an amendment was brought in by way of addition to the rule, and adopted on March 2, Following the inhibition that there should be no independent legislation in an appropriation bill, this was added:

Unless, in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

Nobody would have supposed that under that you could increase salaries; but that was added to the rule, and under that addition to the rule it was decided not only that you could change a law to increase salaries but that the rule was introduced for that very purpose. I now read from the Digest:

It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill, which changes an existing law. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.

So that under the rule that has existed up to the present session of Congress you could increase a salary in an appropriation bill, but you could not diminish it; it could not be reduced. Over and over again the Digest will disclose that it has been ruled that it was out of order to change the law so as to diminish a salary, but that it was perfectly in order to introduce an amendment to increase a sal-Under that construction it was that the law the Senator from ary. Under that construction it was that the law the Schator from New York has quoted from, making appropriations to sundry civil purposes and for other purposes, which freely translated would be the funeral of members, was passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to ask my friend from Massachusetts a uestion. Does not my friend think that, if it can be construed to authorize an amendment to increase a salary, it is a fair construction to say we may also reduce a salary?

Mr. DAWES. I was going to say, as I have said a good many times in another place, that it was the strangest construction that was ever put upon a rule; but I was not responsible for it. The Senator, when I give him the dates, knows very well who was most responsible for it; but under it the salaries have been increased ever since 1838; under it the rule has cut off any attempt to decrease salaries; but, as was very well said by the Senator from Iowa, it is something more than a mischief, and this mischief is increased by a change of the rule made at this very session in a body to which it is not proper for me to allude. As the rule now stands it has been changed in another body, so that you can not only increase, but you can decrease; and the rule now is such that the Committee on Appropriations in an appropriation bill can absorb the most important and vital legislation of the country and make it hang upon the supplies of the Government, and make the supplies of the Government carry through the most objectionable legislaplies of the Government carry through the most objectionable legislation as well as good legislation. It is something more than an inconvenience and a mischief. It strikes at the independence of legislation itself; and unless it is resisted here, we shall, without being conscious of it, lose the power of deliberation upon measures independently and upon their merits in separate bills. What is the reason that required them to keep the appropriations for treaties out of the appropriation bills for the carrying on of the Government? It is that the propriety of an appropriation for carrying out a treaty should be considered independent of the necessities or the exigencies that might for the moment pendent of the necessities or the exigencies that might for the moment be pressing the Government for appropriations to carry on the Government. But now we have the rule so made that there can be embraced in an appropriation bill all manner of legislation; so that the neces-sity of the hour to provide for the carrying on of the Government may carry along with it a measure that never could obtain the sanction of a majority in both branches of Congress except where an overpower-ing necessity of another character and in another part of the bill forces the two branches to yield their judgment and their conviction on these

The very measure that the Senator from New York has called the attention of the Senate to could never have passed as an independent measure. It was tried. I remember very well that the single proposition of raising one of these salaries was proposed in a Committee of the Whole, and though ruled to be in order under this very provision of the rule, the Committee of the Whole, so opposed as they were to the raising of that or of any other salary, overruled the chairman of the Committee of the Whole by more than a two-thirds vote, and of the committee of the trule it was put in an appropriation, in violation of that freedom which the rules of both Houses were intended to secure to the deliberations of those Houses upon each measure by itself, the necessities of an appropriation bill, after repeated conferences in the last hours of the session-for it was approved on the 3d of March, as the honorable Senator from New York calls our attention to the date—to the sacrifice of the convictions of members as well as the confidence of the people in the principle itself, carried it through upon the back of an appropriation bill.

sir, while up to this hour in my service in this Capitol I have stood up for the lowest appropriations and for every measure that cuts down expenditure and has economy in it, so long as the attempt is made to absorb in an appropriation bill the legitimate legislation that ought to be intrusted to other committees of the two branches of Congress, I feel it my duty to resist these things here as a matter rising above the merits of the appropriations. I believe that if they were alone and by themselves I should go with those who are for cutting down the appropriations. I never yet recorded my vote cutting down the appropriations. I never yet recorded my vote against any such propositions, and I do it reluctantly now, because I see that one committee is absorbing all the powers of legislation by this very change in the rule which resulted in the enactment which the Senator from New York has called our attention to. There can be no freedom in legislation, there can be no deliberation upon the merits of independent measures if they are put in between the items of appropriation bills that are necessary for the carrying on of the Government, and the alternative is presented to you to stop the wheels of Government or take these objectionable measures. These particular ones may be wise; but it is the precedent made, through measures not in themselves very objectionable, which makes the danger, and through which, as through a door, wicked and unwise measures are forced.
Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President-

Mr. WRIGHT. I supposed I should not lose my motion by yielding to the Senator from Massachusetts; but I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the difference between the House and the Senate on this bill is the vital point, it seems to me, for the consideration of the Senate. Outside questions have nothing to do with the simple determination of the issue before us. The House of Representatives appropriates but $29,000 for nine professors, while the Senate Committee on Appropriations propose to appropriate $45,800. Why is this difference? It results from the application of the law as we find it written. We turn to the statutes and we find that the salaries fixed by law for these officials require an appropriation of $45,800, and there we stop and make it. The consideration of the question as to whether the law should or should not be repealed is to be taken into account when we come to regard the action of the House, for they may in the Army appropriation bill cut down all Army salaries and then their appropriation of $3,500, or $3,000 to each professor, may be held to be the proper sum. Hence, it is improper, it seems to me, to charge the House with ignorance or to charge it with improper action in making this appropriation as it has been made. When that question confronts us, when we have to meet the question as to whether we will reduce the pay of the other officers of the Army to the amount fixed by the House for these officials, I will meet that question and determine it as to me seems proper; but now I am un-willing to cut down the salary of these professors whom I regard as the very root of the tree of the Army, whom I regard as the head of the institution that gives knowledge and power to the organization the institution that gives knowledge and power to the organization of the Army, and through which, when the rude blasts of war come, nerve, and force, and vitality are given to the armies of the Republic. I am unwilling to strike at this institution that is really the normal school of the Army. I believe that this is an improper place to commence retrenchment. I am opposed to retrenching in these important and vital essentials of the organization of the Army; but I say to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber that I will go with them on those matters that relate to the reduction of the number of officials or to the retrenchment of expenses where without prejudice to the public service money can properly be saved; but in those things that are vital, nay, absolutely essential to the efficiency of this great organization which we all respect and admire, I shall be the last to attempt to reduce its force and vigor.

When the time comes, as I have already said, to examine the question as to whether we can justly reduce the salaries of all of the officers of the Army to a proper standard, and I deem that wise and proper and necessary, I will go with those who will go farthest in retrenching. But I see no reason why we shall seek to cripple this single branch of the Army organization, nor do I see any good reason to begin to retrench at this essential element of the Army organization. These men ought not to be singled out and reduced in advance, but on the contrary the law as it stands ought to be administered, and the amendment of the committee in this respect it seems to me is proper. There are other amendments to the bill to which I cannot give my assent

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in ex-ecutive session the doors were re-opened; and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

ASSISTANT DISBURSING CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for reference:

Resolved. That the resolution of this House passed on the 20th of June, 1874, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "and the Committee on Appropriations provide for the same," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the House;" so that it will read: Resolved, That the salary of the assistant disbursing clerk of the House be fixed at the same rate with the assistant journal clerk, and that the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. Mr. HOSKINS. I ask for the reference of the resolution, but not

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to its being introduced for reference to the appropriate committee.

Mr. HOSKINS. I wish to have the resolution referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. We are considering all House salaries, and I ask that it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOSKINS. I prefer to have it go to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. I prefer to have all dealt with alike. This spasm in favor of one man is not right. I object unless it is referred to the Committee on Appropriations Mr. HOSKINS. Very well.

The resolution was received, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a privileged question and present a conference report, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all after the word "Provided" in line 4 of the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment down to and including the word "dollars" in line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Missouri will make a statement showing the exact effect of this measure: whether the effect is to recognize the validity of all the bonds issued up to this time?

Mr. BUCKNER. In order to accommodate my friend from Indiana, will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a copy of the joint resolution as it will read when these amendments agreed to by the conference committee are adopted, so the House can see precisely what it is acting on and what it is asked to agree to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the sum necessary to pay the sawe from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any reveoues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools: Provided, That any further issue of 3.55 bonds, under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the said commissioners are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia and issue certificates therefor, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but this proviso shall not prohibit the audit and issue of certificates for claims for work and labor already performed and materials furnished, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate of certificates the sum of $15,000,000, including those that have already been converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia.

Sec 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia, and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdeme

Mr. BUCKNER. That, Mr. Speaker, is the joint resolution as it has been adopted by the Senate, and which the committee of conference on the part of the House recommend to be passed on the part of the House, as it will read when the amendments which have been proposed by the committee of conference shall have been agreed to by both Houses. But my friend from Indiana desires to know what has been done in reference to the obligation of the Government, as I understand it, concerning the bonds which have been illegally, or, if you please, fraudulently issued. On that subject, sir, I have to say that nothing is said in reference to these bonds, whether fraudulently or illegally or legally issued, and for one very good reason, if for no other; and that is that this joint resolution does not propose to commit this Government in any respect whatever. There is no line or word or syl-lable that implicates or that commits the Government of the United States to the payment of any portion of these bonds, whether they were issued legally or illegally, fraudulently or honestly. There is no line or word on that subject. What it seeks to effect is that the District of Columbia, out of money collected by taxes, and what heretofore has been appropriated by Congress, now in the Treasury of the United States belonging to this District, its own property, shall be applied to the payment of whatever interest was due on the 1st day of February, 1876. It does not go beyond that. There is not a word which intimates that the Government is bound for one of these bonds. If we desire hereafter, if the thing can be done, if it is possible to separate the good from the bad, separate the sheep from the goats, it may be as well done hereafter as now.

I know it is said that this Congress should first investigate and I know it is said that this Congress should first investigate and then pay, but we are not proposing to pay any portion of this debt. This joint resolution does not guarantee on the part of this Government that it shall pay one dollar. The authority is only given to the commissioners to pay out of their own funds the interest on this debt, whatever it may be, good, bad, or indifferent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why should we make provision in advance? Why should we give these bonds a black eye? Why should we send them out with the caveat to all persons to beware of them—to beware of buying any of them? There is no reason for it. If on investigation we find the Government is bound to pay for any of these tigation we find the Government is bound to pay for any of these bonds when the proper time comes, when the time shall come that it is decided this Government is bound to make appropriation to pay the interest, then will be the time to say what we will pay and what we will not pay.

The joint resolution then says there shall be no more bonds issued.

It says further that there shall be no more work done, the payment for which is to be made in these 3.65 bonds. And it says the board of audit shall issue no more certificates. It cuts off all the sources of expenditure, and all the means by which it is possible for these parties to run this District further in debt. And it provides a penalty and punishment for any officer of the District who shall increase the debt of the District of Columbia hereafter.

debt of the District of Columbia hereafter.

Now, sir, there is a great difficulty which I may as well explain here, while I am on the floor. Let it be assumed that there are fraudulent bonds, let it be assumed that the commissioners and the board of audit have exceeded their authority and ridden rough-shod over the law of the 20th June, 1874, let it be assumed that that is true and that the debt has been increased illegally, and beyond any expectation of Congress, and beyond any legal authority for the increase of that debt. Let all that be assumed to be true, and that it is true, to a very large extent, I have not a particle of doubt. That the commissioners in giving out contracts, in extending contracts, in making repairs on works previously executed, had no authority to pay for such work in bonds, I have not a particle of doubt, and that these gentlemen, especially the board of audit and the board of commissioners, have exceeded their authority. And I am led to believe that there is a large number of claims more or less tainted with fraud. But, supposing all that to be true, what can we do? All these bonds have been issued according to law, by the proper officers, and all appear on their face to be ing to law, by the proper officers, and all appear on their face to be equally valid. How, then, can you separate them, now that they have gone into the country and passed into the hands of innocent purchasers, thousands of these bonds, perhaps millions of them?

If these officers have exceeded their authority, I ask those gentlemen who are making a noise in this House and in the other Chamber how this thing can be rectified? I hold that the Government, whatever its obligation is as to ten or twelve millions of these bonds, is equally bound as to all the bonds that have been issued and are in the hands of third parties. I understand that to be the law.

the hands of third parties. I understand that to be the law.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir,

Mr. HEREFORD. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri? Is it for this House to agree to the report of the conference committee?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; that is the proposition.
Mr. HEREFORD. Now, sir, let me ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. What objection is there to allowing this section 2

That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is part of the proposition which we are sub-

Mr. HEREFORD. That is not, as I understand, the report of the

Mr. HERFORD. That is not, as I understand, the report of the conference committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; that is one of the propositions which we accepted. There is no controversy about that.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] wishes to know what the committee propose to do by this report in reference to the bonds that have been illegally issued. I say, in the first place, that the Government is not in any sense committed in one way or another to those bonds. But my own conjoin is as to all these bonds that have been bonds. But my own opinion is as to all these bonds that have been issued and gone out into the hands of innocent purchasers, that as all of them are equally valid so far as it appears on their face that they have been issued in accordance with the authority conferred on these commissioners and the board of audit and the sinking-fund commissioners, they are all equally obligatory on the Government; and if there be any mode by which we can get at it and separate the good bonds from the bad, I have not found it out. Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question ?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.
Mr. HEREFORD. This discussion commenced in this House on the 27th day of January, when every one knew there was a question about these bonds, and from that time to this, as I am credibly informed, this same board have been issuing bonds. There was an amendment in the Senate which prevented the payment of any bonds issued after the 27th of January. Why not let that remain in the joint resolution? I understand, furthermore, that they are going on and issuing bonds up to the present day. Although they have been denounced as fraudulent, up to the present day they are issuing bonds.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is mistaken, I apprehend, as to the correctness of his information. He is mistaken as to several points.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am not mistaken as to that; certainly not.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let the House understand how these bonds are issued. In the first place they are issued upon certificates put out by

Mr. BUCKNER. Let the House understand now these bonds are issued. In the first place they are issued upon certificates put out by the board of audit. Neither the board of audit nor the board of commissioners have power to issue bonds. These certificates are issued and placed upon the market. They are then brought to the commissioners of the sinking fund and the sinking-fund commissioners issue bonds as the certificates are presented in sums of $500, $5,000, and bonds as the certificates are presented in sums of $500, $5,000, and $10,000. It may happen that there are bonds issued for certificates a large proportion or a small proportion of which are valid, legitimate, and honest and the balance may be made up of certificates, that may be fraudulent. Now, how are we to separate the good from

But my friend from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] says that these gentlemen are issuing bonds now. Let me say that that is not my information. They have not issued any bonds since the 2d of February. I am speaking now of the sinking-fund commissioners, the only body having power to issue bonds. On the 25th of January, after this resolution had gone to the Senate, they passed a resolution that they would issue no more bonds except for certificates then delivered and presented.

Mr. HEREFORD. If that be true, why did you strike out the amendment prohibiting them from issuing bonds after the 27th day of January? If they agreed not to issue bonds on the 25th of January, why strike out that amendment?

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman asks me whether I struck that out, I will say that I did not strike it out; that was a matter for the

Mr. HEREFORD. Then, why did the gentleman agree to the report?
Mr. BUCKNER. Because, sir, it was the best thing that we could do, and I say it was right. After the law had given these men authority to issue these bonds, the mere declaration of the Senate or of the President or of this House that they should not do as the law required of them, it was with them to say whether they would issue them or not; and they acted so far in obedience to the intimation of the Senate as to stop issuing them at all except what were on hand.

the Senate as to stop issuing them at all except what were on hand. It does not amount to more than seventy or eighty thousand dollars. More than that, the board of audit is not issuing certificates; its whole business is tied up. The only question is now whether before any investigation has been made, or any report from the committee stating what bonds are false or fraudulent or in violation of law, they shall stop the issuing of bonds that were due before action was taken by Congress on this subject. Sir, I do not believe in any such doctrine as that. I believe that the only chance for the Government of the United States to assert its rights is to prosecute these offenders of the United States to assert its rights is to prosecute these offenders against the law. If we have given power to these men to do this thing, then we must stand by it.

thing, then we must stand by it.

Mr. HEREFORD. If the gentleman from Missouri thought the Senate amendment was right, why did he agree to strike it out; why not come back to the House and ask the House to stand by him?

Mr. BUCKNER. We accomplished, in my opinion, what was far better for the House than that: we stopped the issue of the certificates, and that is the foundation of the bonds. We cut off the supply

Mr. HEREFORD. The board of audit are in session to-day.
Mr. BUCKNER. Not a bit of it.
Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?
Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. I desire to understand this matter correctly. I understand that the amount of bonds issued since the 27th of January and up to the time the Senate agreed to this report was one million and a quarter of dollars.

Mr. BUCKNER. You are very much mistaken.

Mr. CLYMER. So it was asserted by Senators on the floor of the

Mr. BUCKNER. Unfortunately Senators, like others person, do not know everything.

Mr. CLYMER. Can the gentleman state to the House the amount

Mr. CLYMER. Can the gentleman state to the House the amount issued, if it was not one and a quarter millions of dollars?

Mr. BUCKNER. I had the figures, but I gave them to Senator Morrill, of Vermont, and will send for them; but I undertake to say the amount will not exceed $150,000.

Mr. HEREFORD. Why allow that? Take the gentleman's own statement, and I ask, why allow that?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have given the reason.

Mr. CLYMER. Allow me to read a statement made in the Senator of the United States by one of the most reliable Senators there:

of the United States by one of the most reliable Senators there:

The difference between the amount of the bonds of the District guaranteed by the Government of the United States on the 27th day of January, 1876, and the amount now prescribed by this committee's limit is about a million and a quarter

Mr. BUCKNER. Who was that ? Mr. CLYMER. That statement was made by Mr. BAYARD, of Del-

Mr. BUCKNER. I undertake to say that Mr. BAYARD was mis-

Mr. CLYMER. It is strange that none of his colleagues on the floor of the Senate knew him to be mistaken, and there was vigilance exercised on the occasion.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is not strange at all.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is entirely out of order in this House to discuss the debates in the Senate. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken and is sustained by the Chair.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask pardon if I have trespassed upon the rules of the House, but I undertake to say, and I will have the papers here in a few moments, for I am now speaking from memory, that on the 25th day of January, shortly after the action of this House, the board of sinking-fund commissioners declined to issue further bonds. I beg the gentleman to distinguish. It is not the board of audit that issues these bonds. The board of audit has no power to issue bonds, but the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia who do issue these bonds adopted a resolution to the effect that they would not issue any other bonds at all under any circumstances, except on not issue any other bonds at all under any circumstances, except on certificates already presented and those they agreed to issue bonds for. And so far as I know they have not issued a bond at all. They did issue bonds up to about the 3d day of February; the whole amount, instead of being for a million or a million and a quarter of dollars, as stated by my friend from Pennsylyvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] would not exceed, I am sure, $150,000, and they were issued upon certificates already presented, and which they felt under obligations to issue

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to inquire whether it would not be desirable to postpone final action on this conference report until the Committee for the District of Columbia shall have reported to the House the results of the investigation now being made into the conduct of the authorities of this District in regard to this public debt ? And would not the gentleman himself, inasmuch as no public interest will suffer and perhaps a great public good will result from such a postponement, make the motion to postpone this subject, say for wr. HOLMAN. My friend will bear in mind that almost every step in the progress of this legislation has been a mistake. From the time the act was passed in 1871, organizing the District government up to this time, there has been no enactment which has not ultimately been found to produce unhappy results to this District and to the country. Every step of legislation has seemed to be wrapped up in phraseology which has led to misinterpretation and produced mischievous results. I submit that, inasmuch as there is no necessity for speedy action on this conference report, its further consideration be postponed, say for at least two weeks from to-day. Let us understand this matter fully; let us understand the phraseology which has been adopted by this conference committee in presenting their views to the House, so that in taking this step at least we shall not commit the Government any further than justice and former obligations compel us to do it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will answer the gentleman by saying that we are

Mr. BUCKNER. I will answer the gentleman by saying that we are not committing the Government of the United States to anything.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow—

Mr. BUCKNER. Wait a moment. The effect of the gentleman's proposition is this: There are at least $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 of bonds on which the interest is now due, and which interest the Government has agreed to provide for. The proposition is that that interest shall lie in the Treasury, as these commissioners say they have no power to draw it out, and the faith of the Government is not to be carried out as to what is now due. Let me say that by this hill the carried out as to what is now due. Let me say that by this bill the Government is not committed to anything.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a moment in that connection. The Government is now liable only as a guarantor; that my friend concedes.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not know about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a duty of the Government to see that the necessary provision is made for the payment of interest on these bonds. My friend remembers that this bill as it passed the House contained a provision that nothing in the act providing for the payment of this interest by the District commissioners should be considered as in any way ratifying bonds improperly issued under the authority of the former act, and that clause has been entirely omitted from the bill by this report; and that is the cause of the trouble about the matter. There are two clauses that commit the Government to the amount of bonds outstanding at the time the bill passes. When I come to think of it, the first does not. The first directs the payment of interest upon the bonds issued in pursuance of the act authorizing the issue of bonds. That is the first proposition. It directs the commissioners of the District to transfer to the Treasury of the United States funds for the payment of the interest due the 1st day of Feb-States funds for the payment of the interest due the 1st day of February, 1876, on the bonds issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874. That simply authorizes the payment of interest upon bonds issued in pursuance of the act. There the Government was not committed; but the act goes further than that.

Mr. BUCKNER. Go on and read.
Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to stand by this bill that far. The bill then goes on-

Provided further, That any further issue of these 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited.

All of us saw when that provision was incorporated in the bill by the House that the effect of it was an absolute committal of the Gov-We provided that no further bonds should be issued; that is to say, that the bonds up to that time were obligatory upon the Government, but no further bonds should be issued under that act.

The first clause did not commit the Government, because we only authorized the payment of interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act. But we went one step further, and said that no further bonds should be issued under that act, and thereby perhaps, in legal phrase, we ratified the bonds which had been issued up to that date. To avoid that construction we went one step further, and that was an important step. We provided that this act should not be construed to give validity to bonds issued in excess of the amount authorized. Now when you leave the first proviso standing and strike out the condition, that the act should not commit this Government to liability for all the bonds that may have been issued, you undoubted to the provent of the bonds. edly leave the Government committed to the payment of the bonds, or rather I should say to providing for the payment of those issued up to the time this act is actually passed.

Mr. WILLARD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a

Mr. WILLARD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLARD. If it should hereafter be found that any particular bonds were issued for a fraudulent claim, does the gentleman suppose that the payment of the February interest on those bonds out of the funds of the District would preclude the Government from declaring hereafter that the bonds were fraudulent?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, I think it would; I must say I think it would. I think that every bond on which we expressly authorize the payment of interest as a bond issued up to the time that we declare no further bonds shall be issued, all the bonds issued up to that time upon which we pay the interest, bonds which go into the open market and must be received by ordinary transfer without indorsement, as these are, would imply the faith of the Government to make provision for their payment, and that is the objection there is to this matter.

That is my only objection. If this objection be removed, and if a clause be inserted that the provisions of this act shall not commit the Government to the payment of bonds unlawfully issued, I shall be satisfied with the report.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] for I want to understand this matter. I understand that the purport of this provision is that the Government is not committed to the payment of any of these bonds fraudulently issued

Mr. HOLMAN. That the Government shall not be committed to the payment of any bond not issued under the provisions of the act

Mr. BLAND. But would not the terms of that proviso commit the Government to pay the bonds not fraudulently issued? Is not the Government left in this position—

Mr. HOLMAN. As a guarantor simply.
Mr. BLAND. Well, as a guarantor. But does the gentleman hold that the Government is bound to pay the bonds legally issued?

Mr. HOLMAN. O no, sir.

Mr. BLAND. Well, the proviso says that the Government shall not be bound to pay the bonds illegally issued; implying that it shall pay those legally issued.

Mr. HOLMAN. O no; not at all.

Mr. BLAND. Well, if the gentleman will read the proviso he will see that that is the effect of it. It seems to me that in the haste of drawing it this proviso is a detriment to the whole object of the

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will see that if such were the construc-tion, the proviso could easily be amended. The meaning of the gen-tleman who offered it and of the House in adopting it was simply that the Government assumed no responsibility.

Mr. BLAND. I know that was the intention; but the language implies that the Government binds itself to pay the bonds legally

Mr. HENDEE. I rise to a point of order. Is this debate going on under the rules of the House or by common consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The debate is going on upon the privileged question raised by the conference report.

Mr. HENDEE. Is the debate being conducted in accordance with the rules of the House?

Mr. HENDEE. Is the depate being conducted in accordance with the rules of the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a little confused, I admit. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If any gentleman makes the point that gentlemen in debate must address the House and not each other, the Chair will sustain the point.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] is making, it seems to me, a departure in pleading, as we lawyers say. His first question was why not put off this question until we can investigate these matters—say for two or three weeks? In the first place, I answer that it is not at all likely that the investigation which the District Committee is now carrying on will be finished within three or four weeks; it may last till the end of the session.

But in further answer to any suggestion of that kind, I say that, so far as regards the amendment of the House which the Senate struck out, it is a matter in reference to which the House cannot complain of us. The Senate was unwilling to send out these bonds with a stain upon them. But in order to carry out, so far as we could, what seemed to be the will of the House, we struck at what we conceived to be the very root of the matter. We stopped the work; we stopped the proceedings of the board of audit; and there are now nearly $1,000,000 of certificates for claims which have been audited, but for which bonds cannot be issued until further legislation by Congress. The House committee thought it far better to stop the source of mischief than to be striking at random at the validity of these bonds, when the action of the House did not at all commit the Government as to the validity or invalidity of any of these bonds. If we were paying this interest out of our own money, there would be some propriety in requiring that we should not be committed to any further issue or any illegal issue of these bonds. But we are paying it out of funds that do not belong to us, which belong to the District of Columbia; and the gentleman wants this money to remain there, for what purpose? In order that we may investigate! And when we investigate, what then? What is to be the effect? Why, sir, the only effect of passing a resolution of this sort is that we injure the credit of these bonds; for I cannot conceive that there is any lawyer on this floor who, consulting the decisions of the Supreme Court, can doubt for a moment that these bonds will have to be paid; in other words, whether the obligation of the Government with reference to them is a direct, primary obligation, or a secondary obligation, a mere guarantee by the Government that the Government will have to meet its obligations in reference to these bonds.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me a ques-

ion right here? Mr. BUCKNER. I will, if it is not too long; if it is not a speech. Mr. CLYMER. It will not be long. I merely wish to ask the gentleman whether the general notice given by the action of Congress on the 27th of January last was not such notice as should have put the world on its guard, so that any person taking these bonds subsequently took them subject to all the equities subsisting between themselves and the Government?

Mr. BUCKNER. That is a legal question which I will not pretend to answer.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman has stated that no lawyer on this floor would deny his proposition. I ask him whether he denies mine?

Mr. BUCKNER. It has been said that there was a restriction on the amount of these bonds. I do not conceive that there was anywhere any such limitation. So far as the action of this House is concerned, I will state the fact that the Government has already provided by an appropriation made last year for the payment of the semi-annual interest on more than $10,000,000 of these bonds. There is no limit There is no limitation upon the power of this board of audit, no limitation upon the power of the sinking-fund commissioners. Hence the committee thought they were going in the proper line indicated by the House when they cut off the source by which the issue of these bonds could by any possibility be continued.

I will now call the previous question.

Mr. HEREFORD. I hope not. I would like to be heard for a few

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Missouri will allow my motion to postpone to be voted on.

Mr. BUCKNER. I cannot do so under the instruction of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I trust the gentleman will allow a vote on the motion to postpone and to have the report printed.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is already printed in the Congressional Rec-ORD in the Senate proceedings.

Mr. RANDALL. In to-day's RECORD?

Mr. BUCKNER. In the RECORD of two or three days ago.
Mr. RANDALL. It ought to be printed as any other bill is printed.
The gentleman will also observe that the amount of interest to be paid under the authority of this act is not stated, so far as I can learn from hearing the report read.

Mr. BUCKNER. That was a motion in the House, not a proposition reported from the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow an opportunity to vote on the motion to postpone this report for two weeks. Let us understand this bill, so that under it at least there shall be no possibility of fraud. I know the gentleman does not intend that there should be. But every successive law on this subject enacted since 1871 has been an instrument of fraud, as the gentleman knows. us at least take time to examine this after it is printed. I trust the gentleman will give us not less than two weeks for that purpose.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am not authorized to assent to such a motion. I demand the previous question upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference

Mr. HEREFORD. I hope my friend will not demand the previous question. If he does, we shall have to vote it down. I would like to be heard for a few moments.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman for five minutes

Mr. HEREFORD. I shall not want longer time. Mr. Speaker, even if there were no other reason why I should vote against the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Buckner,] I can see no good reason why the proviso which was placed upon the bill by the Senate was stricken out by the committee of conference. In my humble judgment it is the best or almost the best provision there was in the bill. It is this:

Was in the oill. It is this:

Provided, That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall immediately upon the approval of this resolution transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made: And provided further. That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

I cannot conceive why the committee of conference should desire to continue the power of this board beyond the 27th of January, when the country had notice that fraud in or about this whole transaction was charged here upon this floor.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is the gentleman's objection to continuing the

Mr. BUCKNER. Well, I will explain that.
Mr. HEREFORD. Wait a moment. I understand the explanation -I presume I have no right to refer to the discussion at the other end of the Capitol—but I understand that the reason given is that the committee on the part of the House requested that this board might be continued in power in order that they might be enabled to answer questions. Cannot those gentlemen be made to answer questions out of office and out of power just as well as in office and in power?

But, sir, if there have been no claims improperly audited since the 27th of January and no bonds improperly issued since that date, then why object to this? In my judgment no bonds should be paid that were issued after that time. Then, if I am right in that, why not say so, just as this proviso states?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the suggestion made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. Holman] will prevail, and that is that we should not hurry through this matter. I have been here for many years; we have tried to place limitations upon the Legislature of the District of Columbia; we have tried to place limitations upon the various boards appointed for this District; and yet each and every one has transcended the power confided to it. We have said that they should not incur debt beyond a certain amount time and again, commencing with the enabling act creating the Legislature of the District of Columbia, and yet that Legislature exceeded its power, and every board has exceeded the power given to it. Every time we have added the provision that the debt should not go beyond a certain amount they have come and said: "True, you have told us so, but the work was ordered, the work has been done, the bonds have been issued, and you ought to pay them." We have done that time and again. Still they come and ask us to do the same thing over again. I hope, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion we will make haste slowly; that we will provide every guard againt making mistake in the future.

I know that my friend from Missouri desires to make no mistake in regard to this matter. I have no charge to make against him. I know that mistakes have crept into our legislation when we did not intend to make any. Let us in this instance make haste slowly, and make every possible provision against like mistakes in the future.

I want to say, so far as I am individually concerned, that I shall now at all times claim the enforcement of that provision that not one single bond shall be paid which was issued after the 27th day of January. I want that provision put in by the Senate to remain and to be in force. I trust the committee of conference on the part of the House will so agree with us.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from West Virginia discussed this nestion as it has been frequently discussed before, and that is just as if the board of audit had the power to issue these bonds, and did issue them, when the fact is that board of audit had no more to do with their issue than the gentleman himself.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from Missouri, but I wish to say this, as the same thing has occurred at every point in this discussion, that I know the board of audit has no power to issue these bonds; but I know that the power that does issue them has said that the board of audit had audited them, and that they could not go back of that audit, and that they therefore issued the bonds accordingly. We wish to cut the whole thing up by the roots. Besides, the board of audit goes further back and says that they have no discretion in the matter, because an engineer has been appointed and measured the work and submitted his report that it is so and so, and they must recognize it accordingly.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand the gentleman from West Virginia has objected to the action of the committee of conference on the part of the House because we have not adopted the provision of the Senate requiring the board of audit should go out of existence at once. He tells the House that he is informed that objection to that provision came from us. As to that, sir, he has been correctly informed, but I undertake to say that the provision included in this conference report accomplishes not only everything which could be accomplished by the Senate provision, but that in addition it does another thing, a most important thing in another direction, which the gentleman does not seem to comprehend, and which perhaps it is proper I should explain to the House. There has been an attempt on the part of the commissioners upon one hand to throw the responsibility of this issue of bonds upon the board of audit, and by the board of audit upon the District commissioners. We have in this House ordered an investigation into the affairs of the District of Columbia, and these gentlemen have objected, that they should not be turned over into the hands of men who might be hostile to them, and they have asked that it should not be done until the investigation had been completed. We have taken away from them the power auditing as well as their salaries. This board of audit cannot audit any more, nor have they done so for several weeks.

Mr. HEREFORD. Why?

Mr. BUCKNER. Because, if you will examine the law, you will perceive that the power conferred upon them to audit these claims is expressly repealed.

Mr. HEREFORD. When?

Mr. BUCKNER. By this provision.

Mr. HEREFORD. But this has not gone into effect, and they are anditing to-day.

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; they are not.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am informed they are auditing to-day.
Mr. BUCKNER. Where does the gentleman get his information?
Mr. HEREFORD. This does not restrain them.

Mr. BUCKNER. That does not alter it. He says they are auditing to-day. I say they are not.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am assured of the fact by gentlemen of integ-

Mr. HEREFORD. I am assured of the late by general and stricts.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is misinformed. I talked with the board of audit this morning and they told me they have not audited any claims for weeks past. They have done nothing; they have stopped work, and nothing has been done while this joint resolution has been pending in the Senate. So far as requiring that the bonds issued after January 27 shall not be paid, it did not come from this House, but from the Senate. The provision we induced the Senate committee to adopt is better in many respects. I demand the previous question. previous question.

On the question of seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 69, noes 51; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, ordered tellers; and Mr. Holman and Mr. Buckner were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 89. So the House refused to second the call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to postpone the further consideration of the report for two weeks.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to make it one week, and to add to his motion that the report be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will modify my motion in that way. I move that the further consideration of the report be postponed for one week, and that the report be printed.

Mr. BLAND. I understood the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] to say that bonds were still being issued up to this day. If the report be postponed for a week there is danger that more of these bonds will be issued.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is the question debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Blackburn.) It is.
Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to know what is the object of this motion.
Is it for the purpose that we shall make an investigation? Is it for the purpose of saying that none of these bonds that have been illegally issued shall be paid? Is that the object? Or is it for the purpose of giving the gentleman information as to what this report contains ?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will allow me I will answer his questions. I have already said that up to this time all our legislation in this matter has been unfortunate. When we come to consider the effects of the laws enacted throughout this whole series of transactions we have found mistakes under which fearful frauds, committed against the people of this District and ultimately against the whole people of the United States, have been perpetrated. All we ask is that this subject shall be postponed for one week, not only that we may examine this report, but that we may examine how the Government should ine this report, but that we may examine now the Government should provide or refuse to provide by law for the payment of bonds fraudulently issued. And I admit that one point which I wish to consider as a member on this floor is to what extent we can provide against the payment of fraudulent bonds. We only ask a week's delay, and I trust my friend from Missouri will not object to that.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let me say this, that if the views presented by continuous on the other side are correct if this fraud is going on and

Mr. BUCKNER. Let me say this, that if the views presented by gentlemen on the other side are correct, if this fraud is going on, and if these commissioners are still issuing bonds as is alleged, then the object of the gentleman in this motion is defeated. I notify the gentleman now that a million of certificates are still outstanding and liable to be issued as bonds, and the greater delay you make in disposing of this question the greater is the danger of more of these bonds being issued.

bonds being issued.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that event they will not be paid.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that any interest will suffer by this delay. It is a great deal better that we should proceed cautiously in respect of this bill, and have it printed and see exactly what features are embraced in the report, than that we should proceed with undue

Mr. BUCKNER. It has been printed.
Mr. CLYMER. I desire for another purpose an opportunity to examine this bill. I want to know from the gentleman from Missouri, or from any other source, the modes in which these bonds have been issued and for what purposes. I want to know the character of the frauds that have been committed. I want to know whether these bonds have been issued in defiance of all law, for the purpose of paying counsel fees to defend persons who were on trial before this House. I want to know whether they have been issued to subsidize a press or presses in this city. I want the country to know these things, and then I will know whether I will be justified in voting for this bill or not. I want time to ascertain these facts.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then you should take more time than a week.

You should take to the 4th of July.

Mr. CLYMER. If we are not able in the course of a week to ascertain them, possibly the indulgence of the House will give us longer

Mr. HEREFORD. The postponement for a week cannot do any harm. If my friend from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] is right and if these officers have stopped auditing claims and issuing bonds, where

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the pending motion. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof Mr. Holman's motion was agreed to.
Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SWANN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to present a report. Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the call for the present.

GENERAL ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

Mr. SWANN. I hold in my hand a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the Schenck imbroglio—the question of General Schenck's connection with the Emma Mine business. I desire to present that report to the House to-day. I send it to the desk, and ask permission of the House to have it read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs respectfully report that, in accordance with the instructions contained in the resolution of the House adopted February 7, instant, "to ascertain and report what action, if any, has been taken by the executive department of the Government in relation to the connection of the United States minister at the court of Saint James with the directory of the Emma Mine, so called, and also with the prosecution of the Michado claim, and that said committee be authorized to request the Secretary of State to furnish this House such information and correspondence upon the subject as may not be incompatible with the public interests "the committee transmitted a copy of the resolution to the Secretary of State, who in response thereto addressed to the committee a communication, accompanied by certain telegrams and correspondence, which documents the committee herewith submit to the House, with the recommendation that the same be printed for the use of the House and referred back to the committee for further consideration. for further consideration.

And the committee further report, in obedience to the resolution, that the action of the executive department of the Government appears, so far as the correspondence herewith submitted gives evidence, to have been limited to a recommendation in a telegraphic dispatch dated November 28, 1871, to General Schenck that he should be relieved from the directory of the Emma Silver Mining Company, which recommendation General Schenck appears to have acted upon after the lapse of a week, to wit, on the 6th of December following. But the fact of his resignation does not appear to have been communicated to the public press until the 12th day of January following.

In regard to the Michaelo case, it will be seen by the letter of the Scantians.

In regard to the Michado case, it will be seen by the letter of the Secretary of State that General Schenck has taken no official action whatever in regard thereto. The committee submit the following resolution, and recommend its immediate passage:

Resolved, That the letter of the Secretary of State and the accompanying correspondence herewith submitted be printed for the use of the House and be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

THOMAS SWANN,

THOMAS SWANN, Chairman of Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SWANN. I will state briefly in reference to this report that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have now under consideration the facts connected with this case. It appears, sir, that there is a good deal of information of the most important character that has not yet been acted upon by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They have had this subject under consideration, and will continue their investigation from day to day until a final report can be submitted to the House. At present I will call for action on the report just submitted, and I ask the sense of the House on the adoption of the report. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I object. If the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. Jenks] desires to report these bills as of himself, I have no objection; but it certainly is irregular for any member of the committee to make a report for an absent member of the committee.

Mr. JENKS. Very well; then, as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I report these bills. All I desired was to give credit to the gentleman I have named for the reports accompanying them. Mr. RUSK. They will, then, be reported by the chairman of the

CLERK OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Accounts, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved. That the special committee appointed to investigate the real-estate pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s indebtedness be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk for the time of one month, and the said clerk be paid the sum of $4 per diem for his services.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this report come from the Committee of Ac-

Mr. ROBERTS. It does. It is a substitute for a resolution referred to that committee, and has been adopted by the Committee of Accounts after careful consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it a unanimous report from that committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object inasmuch as it comes from the Committee of Accounts. I think, however, it would be far better if the Committee of Accounts had assigned some one of the numerous clerks already appointed for other committees, and whose entire services are not required, for service on this committee. But as it comes from the Committee of Accounts I am compelled to abide by their

Mr. FORT. The Committee of Accounts tried the plan to which the gentleman from Indiana has referred, and found that no clerk's services could be obtained for this committee in that way. Hardly one committee having a clerk was willing to allow that clerk's serv ices to be used by any other committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have the honor to be the chairman of a committhe which has a clerk who is employed to do clerical service for four other committees. I think these clerks are able to perform service for three or four of our committees without the slightest trouble, and still have ample leisure.

Mr. FORT. I hope there are other committees whose clerks will be able to do the same thing, for then it will save the Committee of Accounts the necessity of reporting in favor of the employment of any more clerks to committees. There are now some twenty committees desiring clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. These clerks have ample time to attend to three or four committees.

Mr. FORT. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, and hope the plan will be adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask for a vote on my resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FORT, from the same committee, reported back adversely the resolution referred to it, that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be allowed a clerk at a salary of $4 per day; and the same was laid upon the table.

CENTENNIAL AUTOGRAPHIC REGISTERS.

Mr. RAINEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Centennial

Mr. RAINEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Centennial Celebration to report back joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) concerning the centennial autographic registers of F. B. Taylor and E. W. Bixby, with the recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment. The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the autographic registers of visitors to the centennial grounds at Philadelphia during the year 1876, devised by Messrs. F. B. Taylor and E. W. Bixby, may, after their completion, be deposited in the Library of the Congress of the United States, and thereafter shall become and ever remain the property of the United States, under the control of the Librarian the property of the United States, under the control of the Librarian of said Library.

The amendment, which was read, was as follows:

Provided, That there shall be no implied obligation on the part of the United States for compensation or liability in regard thereto.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire what is the reason of providing by special law for depositing any one of these things in the Library of Congress? There are such registers kept at a great many important public buildings, and I think Congress ought not to pass this joint resolution unless there is some good reason for it.

Mr. RAINEY. The committee has no definite information in regard to this joint resolution apart from the fact that these appear to be men of enterprise who are desirous of undertaking this business and wish to do so under some provision of law. They ask simply for this right under this joint resolution; but for fear they may come in afterward and ask to be compensated for their services in this regard the committee have recommended the adoption of the proviso which has been read by the Clerk, whereby the Government is not to be held responsible for any future compensation in regard to this matter.

Mr. HOAR. What does the joint resolution provide for?

Mr. RAINEY. For the deposit of the autographic registers of the visitors to the Centennial in the Library of Congress. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAINEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the Commissioner of Agriculture to distribute the report of said Commissioner for the year 1873 to Senators and members of the House of Representatives, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was re-

A bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett,

A bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William Cheatham; and A bill (S. No. 478) amendatory of an act authorizing the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, and of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved January 20, 1871.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment a point resolution and bill of the Henry of the feet out amendment, a joint resolution and bill of the House of the following titles:

lowing titles:
A joint resolution (H. R. No. 73) authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to present the medal made for William H. H. Nash to his widow, Mrs. Keturah J. Nash; and A bill (H. R. No. 1384) to change the name of the schooner Turner and Keller, of Oswego, New York, to that of Falmouth.

CYRUS K. OSGOOD.

Mr. BLOUNT, (for Mr. Hartridge,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2314) for the relief of Cyrus K. Osgood; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES S. CADDALL.

Mr. COCHRANE, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the claim in relief of the estate of James S. Caddall, deceased; and the same was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

JAMES S. CHRISMAN.

Mr. COCHRANE also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the petition of James S. Chrisman, of the county of Wayne, State of Kentucky, to be re-imbursed his expenses in his contested election case in the Thirty-sixth Congress; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. ROSS.

Mr. GAUSE. I ask that the papers heretofore referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, in relation to the case William P. Ross, may

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LOUIS ROSENBAUM.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Louis Rosenbaum; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

E. D. FRANZ.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relier of E. D. Franz; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill (H. R. No. 1054) to extend the time for claimants, under section 11, chapter 459 of the laws of the Fortythird Congress, to prove their claims, with amendments by the Sentinger of the congress, to prove their claims, with amendments by the Sentinger of the congress. are, and to move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The Committee on the Judiciary have considered these amendments, and they find that they do not essentially change the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments proposed by the Senate will be read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out "claimants" and insert "claimant's."
In line 7 after "petition" insert "and be proved to the satisfaction of the court."
In line 8 strike out "the" where it first occurs and insert "his."

In line 8 strike out "of the claimants."
In line 8 strike out "their" and insert in lieu thereof the word "his."
In line 9 strike out "petitions" and insert "a petition."
In line 10 strike out "claimants" and insert "claimant".
In line 10 strike out "for other reasons satisfactory to the court" and insert "by eason of fraud, accident, or mistake."
In line 11 strike out "such claims have" and insert "the claim of such claimant as."

as." In line 12 strike out "claims" and insert "claim." In line 13 strike out "claimants" and insert "claimant." Strike out all after the word "verified" in line 15 to the end of the bill, and in-ert "in such manner as the court shall by rule have provided."

Mr. HOLMAN. We get but a very poor impression of the effect of the changes made in this bill by the mere reading of the amendments. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] will explain the effect of the amendments.

Mr. LORD. The bill is amended in three particulars. First, it changes the plural "claimants" to the singular "claimant." Next, it provides that certain things be done to the satisfaction of the court. Lastly, the most material amendment is to strike out the last clause, by which the evidence to be taken abroad in regard to persons residing abroad before some officer entitled to take testimony is to be duly authenticated. The Senate amend the bill in that respect by proposing that that be done under rules to be laid down by the court. The amendments have been considered by the Judiciary Committee and they unanimously came to the conclusion that they did not essentially alter the bill, and perhaps improved it.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendments of the Senate, and they were concurred in.

CLAIMS OF OWNERS OF LAND IN KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION. Mr. LANE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOAR. I reserve objection until the report is read.
Mr. LANE. I was out of my seat when my committee was called, and I merely ask to make the report now.

No objection being made,

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the substitute and accompanying report were ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JAMES ST. CLAIR, DECEASED.

Mr. LANE also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 225) granting 640 acres of land to the widow and heirs of James St. Clair, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. ASHE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 21) supplementary to the third section of the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts," and ask its passage now.

Mr. FORT. That bill will have to go to the Committee of the Whole, will it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that that is the proper disposition to make of it under the call, unless the House, by unanimous consent, deems it proper to dispose of it otherwise.

Mr. HUNTON. No point of order attaches to this bill; not a dollar is appropriated by it.

Mr. FORT. But it will render necessary an appropriation.
Mr. HUNTON. I can explain it in a moment.
Mr. HOLMAN. Has the bill been read? If not I call for its reading.

The Clerk read the bill.

The first section provides that the following provisions shall be added to the third section aforesaid: The judge of the district court for the eastern district of Virginia shall be and he is authorized to appoint a clerk of the district court to be held in Alexandria, whose duties shall be governed by the laws now in force, and whose office shall be kept in Alexandria, in such room or rooms as the said judge shall designate in the building now used as custom-house, post-office, and court-room; and that the clerk so appointed shall perform the duties of clerk of both circuit and district court, to be held in Alexandria, as provided by said third section, and shall be entitled to all fees and emoluments appertaining to said office.

The second section provides that the clerk so appointed shall keep the records and files of all cases thereinafter brought within the sub-division thereinafter named and certify the same in manner already provided for by law; and that the subdivision referred to over which the said courts shall have jurisdiction shall contain the following counties of Virginia, namely: Lancaster, Northumberland, Richmond, Westmoreland, King George, Stafford, Culpeper, Fauquier, Prince William, Fairfax, Loudoun, and Alexandria; and that all process upon parties or in rem, residing or being in said counties, shall be made returnable to the said courts held in Alexandria or the clerk's office, in manner and form now provided for.

The third section repeals all acts or parts of acts which are not consistent with the act, and provides that the act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to explain the object of the bill, and I am sure that no gentleman who understands it will object to its passage. There are now held in the city of Alexandria all the courts mentioned in this bill. There is a custom-house, or rather a public building, in which the courts hold their sittings; but, under the provisions of the law as it now exists, the papers in all suits tried in the city of Alexandria, whether in the circuit or district court, have to be kept in the city of Richmond.

When a court holds its session in the city of Alexandria those papers have to be transported from Richmond to Alexandria, and after the term closes have to be carried back from Alexandria to Richmond.

term closes have to be carried back from Alexandria to Richmond.

No processes can issue from the city of Alexandria. All processes to summon witnesses for causes to be tried in Alexandria have to be issued from and returned to the office in Richmond.

issued from and returned to the office in Richmond.

The object of the bill is to allow parties whose causes are to be tried in Alexandria to originate suits there, to issue their subpenas there, and to keep the papers in the cause there; and this will save not only vast trouble, but vast expense to suitors. It will not cost the Government one dollar.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman mistaken in this? I suppose the law might properly authorize the court of the District to appoint a deputy clerk to reside at Alexandria. I know it does allow that in many States. But I understand this bill to provide for the appointment of an independent clerk to reside at Alexandria, and of course ment of an independent clerk to reside at Alexandria, and of course that involves expenditure.

Mr. HUNTON. Not a dollar.

Mr. HUNTON. Why not?

Mr. HUNTON. Because the bill provides that this clerk shall be paid by fees only.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. HOLMAN. Well, the same result follows, because after the salary of the clerk himself is provided for by fees, the balance of fees goes into the Treasury of the United States, if there be any balance. Here two clerks will, in fact, receive salaries up to a given amount, and of course a less balance will go into the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTON. But the Government gets no portion of these fees

Mr. HOLMAN. If none are paid into the Treasury now, of course it is a matter of no practical consequence.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. Hunton] if any of the counties embraced in this bill now belong to the western district?

Mr. HUNTON. Not one.

Mr. HUNTON. Not one.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. The existing law now requires that all the fees over and above $3,500 shall be covered into the Treasury. Now, do you not by this bill create an additional office that will take out of the Treasury or prevent $3,500 more of those fees from going into the Treasury?

Mr. HUNTON. There is no new office created that affects the Gov-

Mr. DURHAM. Still you are creating another office that may effect a contingency of that kind.

Mr. HUNTON. I know that; but it does not affect the Government to the extent of a dollar. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

S. K. THOMPSON.

Mr. MacDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (8. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the President to appoint Samuel K. Thompson to the rank of second lieutenant in the Army, with benefits of and credit for length of service as a commissioned officer in the Army prior to August 10, 1874, provided that no pay be given him for the period he was out of the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve my point of order on this bill until there is some explanation given of it.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Clayton submitted the following report, (to accompany Senate bill No. 160:)
The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, late second-lieutenant Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:
That they find that the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-third Congress submitted a report in this case on February 23, 1875, of which the following is scony:

Infinitry, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:
That they find that the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-third Congress submitted a report in this case on February 23, 1875, of which the following is a copy:

"This officer was tried by court-martial in June, 1874, and sentenced to be cashiered. The court consisted of seven members, one of whom was allowed to act as counsel for the defendant; a proceeding admitted by all who have examined the case to be irregular. Four of the court afterward recommended Thompson to the elemency of the reviewing authority.

"Your committee have examined the court-martial proceedings and find the evidence to be contradictory, and much of it of a circumstantial nature; that the papers and affidavits filed by Thompson effectually disprove much of the evidence given before the court, and your committee can but think that if sufficient time had been allowed this officer to furnish the evidence to the court that has been placed before this committee, that the findings of that court would have been entirely different.

"Lieutenant Thompson had been in continuous service in the Army from the commencement of the late war, and had been promoted from the ranks for gallant and meritorious conduct, and at the close of the war was appointed a lieutenant in the regular Army. He furnishes testimonials from a great many officers with whom he served, all speaking of him in the highest terms. No charge was ever brought against him until this for which he was tried.

"In view of all the circumstances, your committee are of the opinion that Lieutenant Thompson is entitled to relief, and therefore report back the bill with amendments, and recommend its passage."

In this report and its recommendations your committee fully concur, and recommend the passage of the bill now under consideration, with an amendment. Your committee would also state that this bill passed the Senate on March 3. 1875, but failed to receive action in the House of Representatives.

Mr MacDOUGALL. I now call the previous question on the bill. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MacDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONALITY OF ENLISTED MEN IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a statement showing the nationality of men enlisted in the United States Army from January 1, 1865, to December 31, 1874, and to move that it be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be also printed in the RECORD. It is not very long, and is very interesting.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Has the morning hour expired? Mr. JENKS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. JENKS. Then I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, Mr.

Cox in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bills on the Private Calendar. This being the fourth Friday of the month, generally known as objection day, any bill not heretofore reached to which one objection is made will be passed over and not reported to the House. When a bill is reached which has heretofore been considered and passed over because of one objection, it will require objection by five members to be again passed over; otherwise it will be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RUTH ISABELLE NAYLOR.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1348) granting a pension to Ruth Isabelle Naylor, formerly objected to by Mr. Douglas.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ruth Isabelle Naylor, widow of Charles Naylor, late captain of Company F of the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers in the war with Mexico, at the rate of $20 per month from the 4th day of December, 1872.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY SCHNETBERG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana, Pennsylvania, formerly objected to by Mr. Douglas.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Schnetberg, a private in Company B of the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers in the Mexican war, from and after the passage of this act.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DE WITT C. SENTER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1591) to pay De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee, mileage and per diem for appearing under summons as witness before a committee of the Forty-appearing under summons as witness before a committee of the Forty-first Congress, formerly objected to by Mr. Hoar.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to De Witt C. Senter, of Jefferson County, Tennessee, the sum of $124, compensation for mileage and per diem for appearing before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of the Forty-first Congress, upon claimant filing a receipt in full for all claim for compensation for said committee. said service

Mr. FORT. Ought not the reports accompanying these bills to be

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the reports are to be read unless the reading is called for by some member.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask that the report in this case be read. As I understand it, that does not waive the right to object to this bill afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. By no means. Objection can be made after the report has been read, and amendments will also be in order. The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of D. C. Senter, of Nashville, Tennessee, asking the payment of mileage and per diem as witness before a committee of the Forty-first Congress, beg leave to report:

That it appears from the affidavit of the claimant that he was summoned in April, 1870, to appear before the committee of Congress on southern outrages; that he did so appear, and was in attendance five days; that he has never been paid for said service as witness nor made application previously therefor. The distance he traveled going and returning was fourteen hundred and sixty miles. He himself bore all the expenses of travel and subsistence, and the claim now made appears to be just. The committee therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

HORACE GLOVER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government, formerly objected to by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the papers in the claim of Horace Glover, for indemnity for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government, after consideration of the same, report:

That, from information furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that seizures of certain goods of Horace Glover were made on the 14th of October and 16th of November, 1871, by George J. Stannard, then collector of customs for the district of Vermont, under authority of the act of Congress of July 28, 1866, to prevent sunggling, and for other purposes, for alleged violation of the revenue laws. Under the provisions of section 15 of said act, the goods were sold by said collector, the net sum of $385.85 being realized from the sale. Suits for forfeiture were prosecuted in the district court of Vermont, and verdicts found and judgments entered against the United States. Collector Stannard proved to be a defaulter, and has never accounted for this money, which he received, to the Government, in whole or in part. Application for restitution has been made to the Treasury Department by F. D. Butterfield, assignee of Horace Glover, and the claim is deemed just by the Department and would be allowed and paid; but, in asmuch as the proceeds of the sale, which constitute the fund out of which restitution might by law be made, by the collector's default have never been paid into the Treasury, no fund is now available for the payment.

Under these facts, the citizen having been wrongfully deprived of his property by an officer of the Government acting within the scope of his authority, the judgment of the committee is that reparation is due from the Government, and they report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Tarbox,] who reported this bill, if it proposes to pay the amount for which the property was sold or what was the actual value of the property?

Mr. TARBOX. The amount only which was received by the Government from the proceeds of the sale.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri, formerly objected to by Mr. DUNNELL.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have not the report before me,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must be aware that debate is

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must be aware that debate is not in order on objection day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was this bill objected to on a former day?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; so the record shows. And the question now is whether the objection is sustained by five members.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the Chair to say that no debate is

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order in the consideration of these bills in Committee of the Whole on objection day.

Mr. KASSON. I deem it necessary to ask some questions about this bill; and, if that cannot be allowed, I must concur in the objection already made.

Mr. BUCKNER. I reported this bill from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and I am prepared to answer any questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that be allowable in the Committee of the Whole at this time, I hope it may be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must decide that it is not allowable. The very object of objection day is to preclude debate.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope, then, that my objection will be sustained by a sufficient number.

Mr. FORT. Unless the bill be explained I must object to it.

The objection being renewed by five members, the bill was not laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to inquire how often objections can be made on private bills. The next bill on the Calendar, House bill No. 29, was objected to on the last objection day. Can objection again be mide to day?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule applicable to these cases, and the Chair hopes gentlemen will give it their attention.

The Clerk ead as follows:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month the Calendar of Private Bills shall be called over, (the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.—Ru'e 129.

FIRST LIEUTENANT HENRY JACKSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 29)

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army, formerly objected to by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa. The bill was read. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be authorized and directed to credit First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army, property and disbursing officer in the Signal-Service, in his account with the United States with the sum of $1.271.34 being the count with the United States, with the sum of $1,271.34, being the amount paid by him as property and disbursing officer in the Signal-Service to Matt France and George M. Brown, citizens of Colorado Springs, Colorado Territory, on false vouchers, and to David H. Sackett, sergeant in the Signal-Service, United States Army, on false receipts presented by him.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late a brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, formerly objected to by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

The bill was read. As amended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadiergeneral and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of the act.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HEIRS OF JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 191) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873, formerly objected to by Mr. Fort.
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this bill should pass without further explanation. I must therefore object.

Mr. FORT. I also object. I simply want to know why the Senate cut down the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Objection to the bill being renewed by five members, the bill was not laid aside to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM H. NESSLE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William H. Nessle, formerly objected to by Mr. WILson, of Iowa.

As amended by the Committee of Claims, it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Nessle the sum of $500, in full satisfaction for services performed by him at the request of the Attorney-General in an investigation of expenditures of the marshal's office in the western district of Arkansas, pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 9, 1874.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

This is a bill for the relief of William H. Nessle, a clerk in the First Auditor's Office for the Treasury Department. The relief sought is additional compensation for services performed in assisting in an investigation of alleged frauds committed by the deputy marshals in the western judicial district of Arkansas. The petitioner claims that in the discharge of these duties the labor performed by him was very much more arduous than that required by his ordinary position in the Department, and that in the performance of the same he incurred personal risk and expenses burdensome and unusual for a departmental clerk. He was receiving a salary of $1,400 per annum, the compensation of a second-class clerk, out of which these extra expenses had to be paid.

Upon an examination of the proofs submitted the committee find that the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress ordered the above investigation to be made. Pursuant to that order the Attorney-General appointed Mr. Benjamin T. Duval as assistant to the district attorney for the western district of Arkansas, and at the request of the Attorney-General Mr. Nessle was detailed as special messenger, with papers and vouchers from the Department, and ordered to report to the attorneys at Fort Smith. The matter to be investigated embraced charges of fraud against the ex-United States marshals in that district. The time and purpose of his visit seemed to have been understood by these ex-marshals and their friends, as attempts were made to capture the papers while en route. This fact increased his personal risk. The stages that he was expected to have been on were stopped by armed men and overhauled, so determined were the parties to capture the papers. These facts being communicated to the district attorney, Mr. Nessle was ordered to return with them to Saint Louis and then to Washington. Subsequently leaving Washington quietly, carrying a part of the papers and forwarding the remainder, he succeeded in reaching Fort Smith in safety with such documentary proof as enabled the district attorneys, with the help of Mr. Nessle, to gather information which led to the detection of extensive frauds and by which the Government was saved several thousand dollars. sand dollars.

detection of extensive frauds and by which the Government was saved several thousand dollars.

For further proof to substantiate the claim, the committee's attention has been called to the report of Mr. Duval, who conducted the investigation, which is found to be Executive Document No. 175, second session Forty-third Congress. On page 4 he says: "The old deputy marshals had been induced to believe that it was a blow aimed at them, by which they would be subject to indictment and punishment. An effort was made to capture and destroy the papers after their arrival at Muscogee, in the Indian Territory." Again, on page 26 of the report, he says: "I have had, throughout this investigation, the earnest, fearless, and indefatigable assistance of Mr. William II. Nessle, of the Comptroller's Office of the Treasury Department. He willingly discharged the additional labor devolved upon him in this matter. Leaving the comforts of home and comparatively light duties of his position, he patiently worked night and day with me, under circumstances where a man of loss nerve and integrity would have fallen. He was at all times faithful to the Government, and performed his duties undeterred by threats of personal violence and uninfluenced by flattery or persuasion. * * For the valuable service rendered in this matter he ought to receive liberal compensation, inasmuch as he has incurred expenses which he would not have incurred in his ordinary position, and which he has been obliged to pay out of his salary."

After a careful examination of all the facts as stated by the petitioner, and the proofs substantiating the same, the committee are of the opinion that some relief should be afforded, and hereby report back the bill with an amendment, and, when so amended, recommend that it do pass.

No further objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be re-

No further objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The bills heretofore objected to have been disposed of. The Committee of the Whole will now proceed to the consideration of the remaining bills on the Calendar, no bill to be laid aside for a favorable report if any one member objects.

ANTHONY LAWSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Anthony Lawson, the surviving partner of Lawson & Brewis, or to his assignee or personal representative, without interest, the amount of the proceeds of sale, for direct taxes due to the United States, as aforesaid, of the lot of land on Commerce and West streets, in the city of Alexandria, and State of Virginia, sold to L. E. Chittenden, and evidenced by direct-tax sale certificate No. 57, dated February 1, 1865; also, of a lot in the same city, on Washington street, No. 39, sold to Peter G. Henderson, and evidenced by a like certificate, No. 58, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Royal street, No. 45, sold to Henry F. Davis, and evidenced by a like certificate, No. 59, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Cameron street, on which are erected two houses, numbers 67 and 69, sold to Henry F. Davis, and evidenced by a like certificate, No. 60, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Commerce street, extending back to Payne street, sold to C. W. Campbell, and evidenced by a like certifi-cate, No. 62, and of same date with the previous one; less, in each case, all the taxes, costs; and legal charges accrued by reason of the sale thereof. Upon the payment of the several sums thereby authorized and directed to be paid, Lawson, his assignee or personal representatives, is to execute and deliver to any person or persons claiming title under the said sale for the non-payment of direct taxes under the laws aforesaid a valid deed of quitelaim or release of all title, right, claim, or demand, by reason of the previous ownership of said property by the said firm of Lawson & Brewis, and is to produce the evidence thereof and file the same with the Secretary of the Treasury, unless the same shall be rendered unnecessary by the title being revested in the said Lawson & Brewis, or either of them, by deed or otherwise, from those so claiming under the said tax sale.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

The committee find that certain lots of land in the city of Alexandria, Virginia, were assessed for direct taxes under the law of Congress approved June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," as the legal property of Anthony Lawson and Thomas A. Brewis, partners under the name and style of Lawson & Brewis, and that default being made in the payment of the taxes assessed thereon, the same were sold under said laws to sundry parties, and deeds executed therefor. The proceeds of sale were paid into the Treasury, and were largely in excess of the direct taxes, costs, and legal charges accrued thereon by reason of the sale thereof as aforesaid.

Under the laws of the United States the original owners are entitled to the avecase.

as aforesaid.

Under the laws of the United States the original owners are entitled to the excess of proceeds, and Thomas A. Brewis having departed this life, the legal right to demand said excess has accrued to Anthony Lawson, the surviving partner of the late firm of Lawson & Brewis.

It appears that all of the lots mentioned in the bill reported by your committee have been repurchased from those who claim under the tax sales aforesaid by said Lawson & Brewis, so that no quitclaim or release deeds are necessary to be executed in order to confirm the titles under said sales.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill, with a change of title and like change of provisions from the bill referred to the committee, in view of the legal rights of the said Anthony Lawson as surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis.

There having no chiestion the bill was laid saids to be represented for

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DANIEL WORMER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1808)

The lief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York, $3,500, in full compensation for expenses incurred in carrying out a contract with the United States to furnish twelve hundred cavalry horses.

The report was read, as follows:

On the 26th February, 1864, the claimant entered into a contract with James A. Ekin, the chief quartermaster of the Cavalry Bureau, whereby he agreed to have delivered at the Government stables at Saint Charles, Illinois, on or before the 26th of March following, twelve hundred cavalry horses of the description and quality of March following, twelve hundred cavalry horses of the description and quanty specified.

It was also agreed that the horses, upon being delivered, should be examined and inspected without unnecessary delay.

At once, upon the execution of the contract, Wormer telegraphed his agents who had helped him about filling previous contracts to purchase horses to fill this contract. They proceeded at once to do so. Wormer went to Saint Charles for the purpose of executing his obligation under the agreement, when he learned, for the first time, that an order had been promulgated, after the date of his contract, changing in several essential particulars the method of inspection of the horses and the conditions on which they should be accepted.

By this new order, which it became necessary very soon to revoke, all horses not accepted were to be branded so as to indicate their rejection; and instead of remaining in the hands of the contractor or owner until inspected, they were to be turned into the inspection-yard of the Government at least twenty-four hours before their inspection.

turned into the inspection.

Under the terms of this order it was found impossible to fill the contract. The owners and subcontractors refused to supply or sell horses upon the condition that, if rejected, they were to be permanently disfigured and materially debased in value, and to take the risk of turning their borses into a common yard with multitudes of other horses, whereby they might contract incurable diseases or be seriously injured.

of other horses, whereby they might contract incurable diseases or be seriously injured.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Wormer appealed to the chief of the Cavalry Bureau to be allowed to fill his contract free from the medifications of the new inspection, but was peremptorily refused.

Shortly after the order was revoked and its author dismissed the service.

The claim is for damage sustained by said Wormer by reason of the violation of the contract and agreement on the part of the Government.

The committee are satisfied that Wormer actually paid out and disbursed large sums of money in the part performance of his contract, all of which sums were entirely lost to him by reason of the conduct of the United States authorities in refusing to permit the contract to be carried out on its original terms. He also, without doubt, failed to realize a considerable profit which would have accrued from the performance of his contract, and has been put to great expense and loss in attempting to obtain re-imbursement from the United States. These two subjects of loss the committee, however, see no way to allow, but they think Mr. Wormer is clearly entitled to be repaid his actual outlay while engaged in the attempt to perform his contract. This sum the Committee on War Claims of the last House fixed at $4,500, and reported a bill for the payment of that sum. Your committee cannot find sufficient evidence that Mr. Wormer's payments amounted to that sum, but recommend the allowance of $3,500 as warranted by the facts of the case. They therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute for House bill No. 116 and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

Objected to by Mr. Piper.

ANDREW WILLIAMS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 859) for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee.

The preamble recites that there issued from the General Land Office of the United States on the 15th day of December, 1859, a patent to B. R. McNabb for the west half of the northwest quarter of section 35, township 36, range 30, in the district of lauds then subject to sale 35, township 36, range 30, in the district of lands then subject to sale at Warsaw, Missouri, containing 80 acres; and on the same day there issued to the said B. R. McNabb a patent for the east half of said quarter section of land; that both of said half quarter sections of land have been sold and conveyed by said McNabb to Andrew Williams, now of Weakley County, Tennessee, and the said McNabb is now dead; that there had, previous to the date of the issual of the patents aforesaid, issued to other parties, namely, Nathan Smally and Barnabas Cochran, patents for the identical same land above described and the parties last named are now in possession thereof. described, and the parties last named are now in possession thereof, claiming the same under their patents.

The bill then provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to issue to said Andrew Williams two land warrants for eighty acres each, in lieu of land warrants numbered 32716 and 43008, the first of which was issued to Martha McNabb, widow of John W. McNabb, and the latter to Rebecca Skaggs, widow of Charles Skaggs, and which were located upon the land above described.

The following amendment was reported by the committee:

Strike out in line 3 the words "the Commissioner of the General Land Office," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Commissioner of Pensions."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do passs

ANDERSON J. SMITH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 597) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith.

The bill, which was read, directs the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay Anderson J. Smith, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of an assistant surgeon in the Army from May 6, 1864, to the date of his muster-out of service, on the 17th day of June, 1865, deducting whatever pay he received for said term as sergeant, and that such payment shall be made out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army.

pay of the Army.

It appears from the report that Anderson J. Smith, then a sergeant in Company A, Seventy-seventh Illinois Volunteers, was captured, in the line of his duty, on the 8th day of April, 1864, and detained as a prisoner of war at Camp Ford, in Texas, until the 17th day of May, 1865; that during this time he rendered valuable service as a physician and surgeon to the United States prisoners at that place.

He was commissioned by Governor Yates, of Illinois, first lieutenant of Company A, of the One hundred and thirtieth Illinois Volunteers, on the 29d day of July 1864 with rank from May 6, 1864 but owing on the 22d day of July, 1864, with rank from May 6, 1864, but, owing to the fact that he was detained as prisoner, never received his commission. That he has been honorably discharged from service.

As he was unable to perform the duties of first lieutenant, by reason of confinement as prisoner, and did voluntarily and ably perform the duties of assistant surgeon, the committee consider that he is entitled to pay as such, and report accordingly.

There being no objection, the bill was laid sside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILBER F. CHAMBERLAIN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 81) for the relief of Wilber F. Chamberlain, of Lewis County, Missouri.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Lieutenant Wilber F. Chamberlain, late sergeant of Company G, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 24th day of June, 1863, to the 11th day of June, 1864, less the amount received by him as a sergeant of said regiment for the period above named.

It appears from the report that the evidence shows that Wilber F. Chamberlain was enrolled and mustered as Wilber Chamberlain, at Jefferson, Ohio, as a private in Company G, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, on the 30th day of September, 1861. It appears from the "statement of service," furnished by the Adjutant-General of the Army, that the said Chamberlain was "a prisoner of war since May 3, 1863, commissioned as second lieutenant, to rank from January 24, 1863, but not yet mustered. Reported prisoner of war to October 31, 1863. November and December, 1863, present."

The commission of Lieutenant Chamberlain bears date from February 1864, present of the commission of Lieutenant Chamberlain bears date from February 1864.

The commission of Lieutenant Chamberlain bears date from February 18, 1863, to give him rank from January 24, 1863. He was not mustered, because he was either a prisoner or suffering from wounds. On the 1st of October, 1863, the following order was issued:

[Special Orders No. 440.—Extract.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, October 1, 1863.

Leave of absence is hereby granted the following officers: * * *
Second Lieutenant Wilber F. Chamberlain. Twenty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, for three days, for the purpose of being mustered out of one rank into another. * * *

ADRIAN R. ROOT, Colonel Ninety-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, Commanding Camp Parole, Maryland.

Lieutenant Chamberlain presented himself to Major Wharton, at Baltimore, for muster, upon the above order, but Major Wharton de-clined to muster Lieutenant Chamberlain. In October, 1863, he was ordered to proceed to Nashville, Tennessee, with a detachment of

The following order was directed to him at Nashville:

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES, Nashville, Tennessee, November 10, 1863.

LIEUTENANT: You will immediately report yourself in person to Colonel Jones, One hundred and fifty-fourth New York Infantry, at the convalescent barracks, who will place you in command of a detachment of men belonging to the second division, Twelfth Army Corps, with whom you will proceed to the headquarters of the corps, receipting to Colonel Jones for the ordnance stores and camp and garrison equipage in their possession.

The evidence is clear that Mr. Chamberlain acted as and performed the duties of second lieutenant; that he was commissioned as such, and that there was a vacancy, but failed to be mustered on account of being a prisoner, on account of sickness, and on account of duties which took him away from where mustering-officers were stationed.

The committee, therefore, recommend the passsage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

COMPANY C, SIXTH UNITED STATES CAVALRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) authorizing an issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of Company C, Sixth United States Cavalry.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to certain enlisted men of Company C, Sixth Regiment War to issue to certain enfisted men of Company C, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, clothing in lieu of, and equal in amount to, that lost by them at the fire which occurred in camp on Washita River, Texas, on the 15th day of April, 1875, as shown and recommended by the board of survey convened at camp on Washita River, Texas, on the 15th day of April, 1875, by orders dated "Headquarters camp on Washita River, Texas," of date of April 15, 1875.

It appears from the report that the five soldiers named in the comnunication of the Secretary of War, on the 15th day of April, 1875, at camp on Washita River, Texas, while in the proper discharge of their duties and acting under the orders of their commanding officer, Captain D. Madden, of the Sixth United States Cavalry, and engaged in extinguishing a prairie fire to protect public property, suffered a loss of their own clothing, consisting, by the report of a board of survey, of five overcoats, two blouses, one forage-cap, one pair of trousers, one pair of boots, one shirt, one pair of drawers, one pair of stockings, one pair of overalls, and two woolen blankets.

The loss under the circumstances above stated is abundantly proved by testimony taken before a board of survey and by the certificate of Captain Madden. But the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, to whom the case was referred by the War Department for a legal opinion, whether the case came within the provisions of paragraph 55, amended Army Regulations, while conceding that the clothing "was not lost by any fault of the men," gives his opinion that "the loss was not the immediate consequence of orders given," but "was occasioned by the violence of the elements," and that paragraph 55 was not intended "to indemnify the soldier against the operation of a vis major or actus Dei;" therefore the Judge-Advocate-General decides that "relief can only be afforded (as it has frequently in fact been afforded) by special act of Congress."

by special act of Congress."

There being no objection, the joint resolution was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass

MARY W. JONES.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. HUNTON. I am sure the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on his objection to this bill if he will allow me to make a brief statement.

The CHAIRMAN. This being objection day in Committee of the Whole House, debate is not in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent merely to say that this is a poor lady, a Union woman during the war, whose property was destroyed by Federal soldiers. Her husband was a victim of the war of 1812, and her son of the war of 1861-'62, both serving the Federal Government. She asks the Government now to increase her pension from $20 to $50. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have no doubt this is a meritorious case; but there are many others, and I would like to see them all provided for. I am compelled, however, to insist on my objection.

MORRIS DWIGHT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 682) granting a pension to Morris Dwight.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Morris Dwight, depend-ent father of Colonel A. W. Dwight, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-second Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay him

And twenty-second Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the late Colonel A.

W. Dwight was killed in the service of his country as a soldier at the battle of Fort Steadman on the 25th day of March, 1865. His father and mother are both living, but for about forty years have lived in and mother are both fiving, but for about forty years have fived in a state of separation. The son performed, prior to his death, his filial duty alike to both, but by his will left his estate to his mother, who is amply provided for. At the time the son made his will, his father, Morris Dwight, who is now about eighty years old, was the prospective heir to certain property in Virginia, which would have placed him also out of reach of want, and this consideration prevented the son from making provision for his father by will. The property which the father would have received hes been lest without the default of the father would have received has been lost without the default of the father, and he is now left in his old age almost penniless. Had the son lived, the father would not thus have been left in want, and as the son's death was for his country, the country should discharge, on account of the services and wounds of his son, this debt.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA A. MORRIS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1460) granting a pension to Lydia A. Morris, widow of the late John K. Morris, Company A, Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lydia A. Morris, widow of the late John K Morris Cavanay A Fifth Ohio Volunteer of the late John K. Morris, Company A, Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, to take effect on and after the date of her said husband's death, as appears from evidence on file in the Pension Department, in application No. 50829.

It appears from the report, which was read, that John K. Morris was enrolled in said company and regiment September 10, 1861. That on the 28th day of February, 1864, said Morris, with some comrades, attended a prayer-meeting near the camp, and inside the Union lines, and on his return to camp fell into an open well, with two other men, and was drowned. Both his captain and lieutenant swear that he was drowned in the line of duty.

The committee further find from the evidence that said soldier left surviving him the petitioner his wildow and one legitimate child. John surviving him the petitioner, his widow, and one legitimate child, John K., born August 1, 1862.

They further find that the application is fully sustained by the evidence, and therefore report said bill back and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN A. STEWART.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1809)

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1809) granting a pension to John A. Stewart.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of John A. Stewart, late a private of Company A, Sixty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month, in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, being in session Friday, the 25th of January, 1876, one of their regular days of meeting, John A. Stewart, late a private of Company A, Sixty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, presented himself before the committee and made application for an increase of his pension; whereupon the committee had a medical examination of the applicant made in their presence by Dr. Hood, medical referce of the ension-Office, who reported two specific permanent disabilities, one a loss of the left arm near the shoulder, and the other a loss of the third finger and third knuckle of the right hand, which induced an ulcer in the right shoulder, by which the right arm is two-thirds disabled. The applicant now receives a pension for the loss of his left arm of $24 per month, and asks an increase of his pension for the disarm of $24 per month, and asks an increase of his pension for the disability of his right arm of $12 per month. The applicant was twice shot through the left arm and once through the right hand. Both his shoulders are very greatly shrunk and wasted away, and his general health is not good. All the injuries named were received by the applicant in the line of his duty as a soldier. Your committee therefore report in favor of granting his request, and recommend that the accompanying bill be passed for his relief.

ELIZABETH R. HULL.

The next bill on the private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1810) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Hull.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Elizabeth R. Hull, widow of William Hull, late a private in Company D, Seventh Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the committee have carefully considered all the evidence in the case, and find that deceased was enrolled August 18, 1862, as a private in Company D, Seventh Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers. That he, with other comrades, about the middle of November, 1863, without permission, went to a dance some two miles from camp, and were arrested and sent to military prison at Nashville, Tennessee. That while in prison he was attacked with inflammation of the pleura, and was sent to prison hospital, and died there of that disease December 8, 1863.

That none of his comrades, who were arrested at the same time, were ever court-martialed or punished for the same offense, but were returned to duty, as he would have been but for his sickness and death. The committee further find that the applicant is the widow of deceased, and that he left two legitimate minor children, as stated in her application. The committee are satisfied from the evidence that the soldier died of disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty, and therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 242) and recommend the passage of the saure.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass,

WILLIAM T. SIMMS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 362) granting a pension to William T. Simms.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William T. Simms, late first lieutenant of Company E, Eighty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, and pay him a pension for permanent and total disability of the first class from and after the passage of this act. It appears from the report, which was read, that at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, Major Simms was first lieutenant and aid-de-camp to General Alexander S. Webb, commanding First Brigade, Second Division, Second Army Corps. In said battle said Simms received a gun-shot wound in the left side of the head, the ball penetrating the mastoid-process bone, destroying the facial nerve and hearing on left side of his head or of left ear, producing facial paralhearing on left side of his head or of left ear, producing facial paralysis of left side of head and of right side of body, disabling the right arm and hand and power over the right leg and foot. The surgeons examining said Simms place him in total second grade, incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. In an examination had before M. K. Hogan, examining surgeon, on June 3, 1874, it is stated that the disability is permanent and will increase. It is further stated that the paralysis and atrophy of the muscles supplied by left facial nerve have increased. The disabilities of the applicant are so complex and aggravated that, in the lauguage of M. K. Hogan, they nearly approached in March, 1871, the definition of total of the first grade, and will increase. The same surgeon, in June, 1874, says the dynesthesia of left side of head and face has increased. The paralysis of arm and leg has not perceptibly increased since March, paralysis of arm and leg has not perceptibly increased since March, 1870. This is certainly owing to the great care and good treatment received by claimant. The shortening and deformity of right foot and hand have increased slightly; for purposes of labor are nearly equivalent to loss. The claimant requires almost constant attention and close watching; closely cared for and constantly followed. Surgeon Ferguson says for purposes of manual labor the disability is equivalent to the loss of two limbs; is incurable, and will increase. Dr. Agnew says, in June, 1874, that he had examined Colonel W. T. Simms, and found that he had total paralysis of his seventh pair (facial nerve) in left side; that his left ear is totally deaf; that he is unable to close his left eye in consequence of paralysis of his orbicularis, and that his vision in his left eye is gradually becoming impaired, in consequence of his inability to close the eye. Dr. Brown-Sequard says, on May 20, 1874, for nearly two years Lieutenant-Colonel W. T. Simms has been under his professional care. He is paralyzed of right limbs and of left ear and left side of the face, and the lesions of the cranium and the brain, that have caused and now maintain the paralysis of these various parts, are such that there is no possibility of his ever being cured. There is no doubt whatever that the patient, who has had to be under medical treatment all the time since he was wounded, will for the rest of his life be an invalid, needing constant nursing and medical attention. Few cases, indeed, present such a statement of facts as this; and because of its singularity in such prominent, positive, and permanent disabilities, increasing with the years, the claimant should be increased to first grade, and the committee so recommend.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCIS BERNARD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Francis Bernard.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Bernard, late a private in Company K, of the Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FANNIE E. RECORDS

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1811) granting a pension to Fannie E. Records.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fannie E. Records, widow of Albert B. Records, late a private in Company G, of the Fifteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the applicant is the widow of Albert B. Records, deceased, who was a private in Company G, Fifteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion. That he enlisted on the 24th of October, 1861, for three years, unless sooner discharged, and was regularly mustered into service on the 20th of the following December. That he was a good soldier, and served faithfully till he was honorably discharged on the 28th of December, 1864. That he was with his regiment on duty most of the time in Louisiana and Texas, and was greatly exposed to the hot, humid climate of Louisiana and to the malaria arising from the flats and marshes of that State; and while there was attacked with and suffered much from diarrhea, in the spring and summer of 1852. In the fall of 1863 had intermittent fever, and was sent to Saint James Hospital, where he underwent medical treatment, and in about two months was able to join his regiment again. In June, 1864, he was again attacked with the same fever, and in July following was sent to the general hospital, from which he was finally discharged in December, 1864. When discharged, he was in a very feeble condition, and so continued to his death. In that interval he had several attacks of fever, diarrhea, and pneumonia, and died of consumption on the 3d of December, 1870.

The application was rejected because it did not clearly show that the disease of which he died was contracted while in the line of duty. While it does not appear that he had consumption while in service, yet the facts in the case show, beyond doubt, that his constitution was undermined and his health was broken down by exposure while in the line of duty, from the effects of which he never recovered; that his feeble condition rendered him liable, if it did not invite, pulmonary attacks, and made him an easy victim to the disease of which

The committee is, therefore, of opinion that the disease of which he died, though not directly contracted while in service, was a necessary result, and clearly traceable to the exposure he underwent while in the line of duty. They therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID J. GARRETT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett.

The bill, which was, read authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David J. Garrett, late a private in Company C, Ninth Iowa Cavalry.

It appears from the report, which was read, that on the 5th day of Angust, 1863, David J. Garrett, then a healthy man, enlisted in the service of the United States as a private in Company C, Ninth Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, to serve three years or during the

That in the month of December, 1863, the said Garrett, while in the service of the United States, was taken with the measles, and before he had entirely recovered therefrom he was exposed in a snow-storm, while on guard duty in said service, and caught cold; the disease then attacked his eyes, and they became so affected that in the month of June, 1864, catarrhal ophthalmia resulted therefrom, and in that same summer terminated in the entire loss of his left eye, leaving the right eye somewhat affected.

He continued in the service, doing duty whenever able, till the close of the war, and he was honorably discharged February 28,

His right eye continued to be affected after the loss of the left, and became more and more diseased till he has almost lost his sight, and has become entirely disabled from performing manual labor.

Under the circumstances of the case the committee recommend the granting of his petition and the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass

MRS. JANE DULANEY.

MRS. JANE DULANEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane Dulaney, widow of William Dulaney, late colonel United States Marine Corps, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

It appears from the report that Jane Dulaney is the widow of the late Colonel William Dulaney, of the United States Marine Corps, who died on the 4th of July, 1868. This officer entered the service of the corps June 10, 1817, as second lieutenant. He served continuously on shipboard and at different naval stations to July, 1828, having been promoted in the mean time to first lieutenant, captain by brevet. been promoted in the mean time to first lieutenant, captain by brevet, captain, and commanded the guard of the United States frigate Constitution in December, 1825. He was the first officer of the Marine Corps to volunteer his services for field duty at the breaking out of the Florida war, and he served with conspicuous gallantry and untiring energy and devotion throughout that war, commanding the Marines and a portion of the Army. He was complimented by Major-General Jesup in General Order 102, and tendered the thanks of the country therein; and General P. F. Smith also testified in the highest terms to the Navy Department his appreciation of Dulaney's brilliant services, and in his honor Fort Dulaney was named. During these campaigns he was prostrated by disease, and advised by a surgeon that to remain longer in that malarious climate would endanger his life; but, not withstanding this advice, he continued in the held until been promoted in the mean time to first lieutenant, captain by brevet, life; but, not with standing this advice, he continued in the ield until the close of the war, when he returned in command of his force.

When in command of Fort Pickens, in 1846, he again tendered his services for the Mexican war, and commanded the marines in that war services for the Mexican war, and commanded the marines in that war with marked gallantry, and was at the storming and capture of the castle of Chapultepec and the capture of the Belen Gate and the city of Mexico, and in the mean time was promoted and commissioned major by brevet and major, and, for gallant and meritorious conduct, received, after the capture of the city of Mexico, as a high appreciation of his splendid and noble services, the brevet of lieutenant-colonel. After the close of the Mexican war he served continuously in command of the marine-barracks at New York, Boston, and Portsmouth; mand of the marine-barracks at New York, Boston, and Portsmouth; and, although a native of Virginia, at the firing of the first gun at Fort Sumpter he again offered his services to his country for duty in the field, and he was at once commissioned, by the lamented President Lincoln, colonel, and placed in command of the marine battalion at Norfolk, Virginia, and continued in active service until after the close of the late civil war. On the 8th of November, 1865, after having served his country faithfully for almost half a century, he was retired under the act of Congress retiring officers of forty-five years' service. He died upon the retired list July 4, 1868, as before stated, leaving no blot upon his name. The physician who attended him in his last sickness certifies that he died of congestion of the brain, arising from causes produced while in the service of his country and in the line of

His widow, Mrs. Jane Dulaney, is poor and entirely dependent upon others for support in her old age.

This bill has twice passed this House, Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses, without any opposition.

In consideration of the foregoing facts, all of which are established beyond any doubt by the evidence submitted to the committee, your committee are of opinion that Mrs. Jane Dulaney is entitled to a pension, and they report back said House bill 1118, and recommend that it do pass

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise. We have accumulated a great many bills which will have to be acted on before we adjourn. The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. Blackburn) having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole House had according to order had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report back sundry bills and joint resolutions, some with and some without amendments.

BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report in their order The SPEARER pro tempore. The Clerk will report in their order the bills which have been reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and those to which there is no objection will be considered as read a third time and passed. The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1348) granting a pension to Ruth Isabelle Naylor;
A bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana:

A bill (H. R. No. 1591) to pay De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee, mileage and per diem for appearing under summons as witness before a committee of the Forty-first Congress;

A bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government;
A bill (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B Dyer, late a brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance United States Army.

WILLIAM H. NESSLE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William

Mr. HOLMAN. On account of facts which I have heard stated since the action of the Committee of the Whole, I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calen-

Mr. BRADLEY. Pending that motion I move that the amendment reported from the committee be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that no amendment is reported with the bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. There was an amendment submitted, and I now move its adoption. It is as follows:

In line 5 strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500; " so that it will read: That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William H. Nessle the sum of $500, &c.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw his motion to recommit, that the gentleman from Michigan

[Mr. Bradley] may offer his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill ought to be recommitted. A gentleman familiar with the facts, the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GAUSE,] will make a statement if my friend from Michigan will hear

Mr. GAUSE. I would like to be informed by those advocating the bill, if it is not true, as has been stated to me, that this gentleman was a clerk in the Comptroller's Office during the time he was perwas a cierk in the Comptroller's Office during the time he was performing these services for the investigating committee, and was paid as a clerk during the whole of that time, and was also re-imbursed for his expenses in going to and coming from Arkansas. If so, I would like to know what the remuneration authorized by this bill is for.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to say to the House, and to the gentleman who has made this statement, that the report which was read in the Committee of the Whole discloses the whole of the facts. Mr.

Nessle was drawing his salary as a clerk from the Treasury Department at $1,400 per annum. He was detailed at the request, or at the suggestion rather, of a committee of the House of the Forty-third Congress who had been appointed, pursuant to a resolution of this House, to make an investigation regarding the charges of fraud that had been supposed to be committed by the marshals in the western judicial district of Arkansas. It became necessary that some person should be detailed to visit that section of the country to aid in the investigation; and Mr. Duval, who had been appointed and acted for a short time as a short-hand reporter, resigned the position, stating that, in view of the hazard to life and the arduous nature of the duty the compensation which had been allowed him of $10 a day was not a sufficient compensation to induce him to perform the duties any longer. At the suggestion of the committee of this House, who had become acquainted with Mr. Nessle's ability, and also his knowledge of the details in this matter, he was appointed upon the request of the Attorney-General to go to Arkansas and aid in this investigation.

Now, I think gentleman will agree with me that the statement of the petitioner is borne out by the facts that additional expenses were entailed upon him by an absence from home for between four and five months, while at the same time he was incurring special hazards as set forth in the report. The Attorney-General stated that the felt that Mr. Nessle was entitled to additional compensation, but that he could not pay him on account of the law intervening.

The Ex-Attorney-General wrote a letter to the committee in reply to one addressed to him regarding the matter, stating that in his opinion additional compensation should be allowed. While the committee thought perhaps that the $1,000 asked for might be more than the circumstances of the case required, yet it was the unanimous report of the committee that Mr. Nessle was entitled to a compensation of $500, and they directed the reporting of the bill to the House.

For my own part, I believe it is a small compensation. No gentleman who hears me, if he drew a salary for certain duties such as are entailed upon a clerk in one of the Departments working a certain number of hours, would consent without extra compensation to be number of hours, would consent without extra compensation to be detailed upon such duties as these, with all the additional labor entailed upon him, such as working from seven o'clock in the morning till twelve o'clock at night for many days, and reducing all the testimony that was taken to writing without additional expense to those taking the testimony. I believe if the House have paid attention to what I have stated, they will without dissent pass the bill.

Mr. GAUSE. What was the $10 a day for?

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Nessle did not receive $10 a day.

Mr. GAUSE. What did he receive in addition to his compensation.

Mr. GAUSE. What did he receive in addition to his compensation as a clerk ?

as a clerk?

Mr. BRADLEY. He did not receive anything except his expenses.

Mr. GAUSE. Then he was a clerk in the Department, detailed for duty, and paid his expenses during the time he performed that duty.

Mr. HOAR. He acted as a short-hand writer.

Mr GAUSE. The committee only claim that he is entitled to this compensation because of the absence from his family and the dangers he encountered while performing this duty. Well, the first point we will pass over, for most of us would enjoy extraordinary compensation now if that argument were applied. As to the other reason, it is false. It is untrue in every particular that Mr. Nessle was ever in a particle of danger while performing these duties. I am familiar with that people, for I have lived among them all my life; and I know that particle of danger while performing these duties. I am familiar with that people, for I have lived among them all my life; and I know that there was no more danger to Mr. Nessle in performing his duties than there is to me in performing my duties here to-day; and I am opposed to paying a man $500 for his exposure to danger when there was none. Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GAUSE] a question. Will he state that the detective originally sent there for the purpose of ascertaining the frauds alleged to have been committed was not in danger of his life from the people of Fort Smith? Mr. GAUSE. I do not know what you refer to.

committed was not in danger of his life from the people of Fort Smith?

Mr. GAUSE. I do not know what you refer to.

Mr. DURHAM. I refer to Mr. Whittney, the detective who was sent out there originally to discover these frauds.

Mr. GAUSE. I do not belong to the detective force, and I do not know what risk he may have run.

Mr. DURHAM. There is abundant proof on the record to show that his life was in danger.

that his life was in danger.

Mr. GAUSE. Detectives often get themselves into difficulties which a man under the direction of the Government and having the whole power of the Government to sustain him never gets into.

Mr. BRADLEY. I would ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Gause] if he was present at the time the stages were stopped as alleged in the report? Mr. GAUSE. I w

I was not; that was in the Indian country.

Mr. BRADLEY. Do you know that the stages were not stopped?

Mr. GAUSE. I do not.
Mr. BRADLEY. Then why did you say that the statements regarding that matter are false?

Mr. GAUSE. Was Mr. Nessle in the stage?
Mr. BRADLEY. The stages were stopped.
Mr. GAUSE. Will the gentleman answer my question: Was Mr. essle in the stage?
Mr. BRADLEY. Hear me.

Mr. GAUSE. Answer me that question.
Mr. BRADLEY. The proof shows that the stages were stopped and that Mr. Nessle was inquired for.
Mr. GAUSE. He was not in the stage?

nat Mr. Nessie was inquired for.

Mr. GAUSE. He was not in the stage?

Mr. BRADLEY. No, sir; he was detained by sickness.

Mr. GAUSE. Then where was his danger?

Mr. BRADLEY. The reason was that he was sick.

Mr. GAUSE. There are a thousand stages stopped.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to make a suggestion to the House. If I understand the gentleman who has just spoken to the bill, a fourteen-hundred-dollar clerk has been detailed and employed as a short-hand writer for a period of several months. Now, entirely independent of this question of danger, I do not believe there is any gentleman on either side of the House who has had occasion to serve on investigating committees and employed short-hand clerks, as I had occasion gating committees and employed short-hand clerks, as I had occasion to do last winter, who does not know that justice requires very con-siderable additional compensation to such clerks. A short-hand clerk has to follow the taking of testimony all the time the committee sits; he has to have his attention constantly on the alert to catch every word that is said, and then has to sit up far into the night to reduce the testimony into writing for the use of the committee next day. It is one of the most laborious and trying occupations that the human intellect can be subjected to, and in Louisiana where we had two or three short-hand writers we broke them down and were obliged to telegraph to Saint Louis to bring on an extra one. Hence, leaving entirely out of consideration the danger, certainly no one can say that it was just to detail a fourteen-hundred-dollar clerk and employ him three months as a short-hand reporter to take testimony without giving him at least $10 per day additional.

Mr. BRADLEY resumed the floor.

Mr. GAUSE. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas yielded

Mr. GAUSE. Only for the gentleman to make an explanation; I claim that I have the floor now.

elaim that I have the floor now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore The Chair does not so regard it. The Chair notified the gentleman from Arkansas that he was in possession of the floor and could proceed, but he yielded to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY,] who yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. GAUSE. Then I have the floor now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GAUSE] seems to assume that because Mr. Nessle was not in the stages at the time they were stopped, that he was in no danger.

Now, the committee do not undertake to say that Mr. Nessle was not in the stages at that time. Mr. Nessle was taken sick at the point of departure and did not go out in the stage he was expected to go in.

Now, to show that there was a combined effort on the part of the friends of these marshals to obtain possession of these papers, I will say that information was sent in advance of the stages upon which say that information was sent in advance of the stages upon which Mr. Nessle was to go out at the time. It was supposed that the papers would be taken with him. An attack was made upon the stages and Mr. Nessle was inquired for, but, having been detained in consequence of sickness, he escaped any injury at that time. Beyond a question, it was the possession of these papers that was desired by them. These facts coming to the knowledge of the district attorneys, they telegraphed Mr. Nessle to return with the papers by another route. And the testimony shows that had he not acted upon that suggestion. suggestion-

Mr. HOAR. How many short-hand writers had the committee?

Mr. BRADLEY. Only one at the start and he was discharged, and Mr. Nessle performed the whole duty.
Mr. HOAR. We had four in Louisiana.
Mr. BRADLEY. There is no doubt but these papers would have been captured if Mr. Nessle had not returned, and so far as Mr. Nessle's safety was concerned we may judge what would have been the result. It became apparent to the Government that the box of papers which had been sent by express to Washington was being watched at the express office. It was only by strategy that the papers were abstracted and transported to their destination without the knowledge of these parties, the box being left in the express office where it could be seen every day.

Now I submit to the gentlemen of this House whether or not, when Now I submit to the gentlemen of this House whether or not, when these facts had been discovered, the messenger in charge of such papers as these, and under such circumstances, did not incur some personal danger? But, leaving that entirely out of the question, there is the additional labor which, as I said before, occupied his time each day from seven o'clock as long as there was any daylight to aid the district-attorney in examining witnesses, he having had previous experience in the Department, and being able to draw out the information needed. He then worked on until twelve o'clock at night in reducing this testiment to the form of a report which had not again to ducing this testimony to the form of a report which had not again to be written. Now I submit whether he did not fairly earn the $500 recommended by the committee. I now call the previous question.

Mr. GAUSE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for one moment until I can say a few words.

Mr. BRADLEY. It is getting late, and I hardly think it necessary to discuss this matter further.

Mr. GAUSE. I wish to say but a few words.

Mr. BRADLEY. If the gentleman has any further information to give to the House I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. GAUSE. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar.] I wish to say that this was not a hard-working committee. It went there and worked at its leisure; it occupied its time as best suited itself: there was no very hard work done by them. There was went there and worked at its leasure; it occupied its time as best suited itself; there was no very hard work done by them. There was no great demand made upon the time of Mr. Nessle, nor upon his ability as a stenographer. Any ordinary clerk could have performed all that he did and just as well. Therefore there is no reason for giving him any extra compensation on that ground.

As to the other ground alluded to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Bradley] he is entirely mistaken. When the stage was stopped it was passing through the Indian Nation, at or near Muscogee. Mr. Nessle was not on the stage at that time; that was not his natural route home at all. Those persons charged with having conspired to stop the stage were the two republican marshals of that district, whose conduct was being investigated; they were the two republican marshals, Britton and Roots. Now I do not believe that the gentleman will stand up here and contend that members of his own party are guerrillas, who will stop stages and murder Government clerks. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BRADLEY. I now call the previous question on the pending

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the pending question on my motion to re-commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Cal-

Mr. BRADLEY. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hol-Man] was not recognized by the Chair to submit that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and he did submit the motion to recommit. But the Chair understood him afterward to withdraw the

Mr. HOLMAN. I certainly did not withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. How was it possible that the motion to recommit was not withdrawn, when the Chair entertained and submitted to the House an amendment, which would not have been in order if the motion to recommit had been pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment was already pending, having been reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the Clerk searched the bill and found

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk did not at first find the amendment, but afterward found it incorporated in the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is well understood in parliamentary law that the motion for the previous question brings the House to a direct vote on any pending amendment and then on the bill, and that it cuts off the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that when a motion to recommit is pending and a call for the previous question is made, the previous question, if sustained, brings the House to a vote first on the motion to recommit. That motion has been made by the gentleman from Indiana, who was recognized by the Chair, and who gentleman from Indiana, who was recognized by the Chair, and who insists that he did not withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Record will show that I said nothing about withdrawing the motion; but to avoid trouble, I would just as soon have a vote directly on the bill. I therefore withdraw the motion. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the motion to recommit, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Bradley] renews the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500" was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW WILLIAMS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 859) for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to strike out "Commissioner of the General Land Office" and insert in lieu thereof "Commissioner of Pensions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

Bills and joint resolution of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation, were severally taken up, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I first ask for the reading of the original concurrent resolution as it passed the House.

Whereas from information derived from the Commissioner of Agriculture there are about ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1873 undistributed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein.) That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives twenty-live copies of said report, including the number heretofore delivered to members of Congress during the present session.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 of the resolution strike out the words "deliver to each Senator and member of" and insert "distribute to the Senate twenty-five hundred copies and to."

In line 5 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seven thousand five hundred."

Mr. HOLMAN. Those who have drawn portions of these volumes, as I understand it, are not to receive any increased number under this concurrent resolution as amended?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. No; what have been drawn by members will be deducted from the number allowed under this reso-Intion. # HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 26, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By previous order the House is now in session as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will preside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. EDEN.) The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RIDDLE] is entitled to the floor.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. Speaker, politics is a progressive science. It is an experimental science, consisting in the application of temporary contrivances to temporary emergencies. It has been wisely said that "no lines can be laid down for civil or political wisdom. They are a matter incapable of exact definition." And with equal wisdom it has been asserted that "all political principles have been raised by hasty induction from limited facts; and that therefore it is the part of a wise man when he adds to the facts to revise the induction, and, inwise man when he adds to the facts to revise the induction, and, instead of sacrificing practice to principles, modify the principles that he may change the practice."

We are the representatives of the people. It is our solemn duty to carry out their wishes and execute their sovereign will, regardless of our own individual opinions, preferences, or predilections. our own individual opinions, preferences, or predilections. And it is our duty to incorporate that will, when clearly ascertained, into the legislation of the country. We, as the representatives of the people, can have no will of our own in opposition to the will of the people. Even if they are wrong, nevertheless their behests must be carried out with unquestioning obedience. Let them have their own way, and if they are wrong that principle of noble generosity which is inherent in the popular heart will in the end lead them to correct the evils of their own production. The magnet of their souls when touched by remembrance ever trembles to the poles of truth and right and by remembrance ever trembles to the poles of truth and right and

I am fortunate in being able to re-enforce these sentiments by the opinion of the most profound political philosopher of modern times; for it was Edmund Burke who said:

In effect, to follow, not to force the public inclination; to give a direction, a form, a technical dress, and a specific sanction to the general sense of the community, is the true end of the Legislature. * * * It would be dreadful, indeed, if there was any power in the nation capable of resisting its unanimous desire, or even the desire of any very great and decided majority of the people. The people may be deceived in their choice of an object. But I can scarcely conceive any choice they may make to be so very mischievous as the existence of any human force capable of resisting it. of resisting it.

And when speaking in 1772 on a bill respecting the importation and exportation of corn, he said:

On this occasion I give way to the present bill, not because I approve of the measure in itself, but because I think it prudent to yield to the spirit of the times. The people will have it so; and it is not for their representatives to say nay. I cannot, however, help entering my protest against the general principles of policy on which it is supported, because I think them extremely dangerous.

And since this session of Congress began, on the 20th day of January, 1876, the same principle of action was indorsed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] whose utterances upon this floor seem always to be directed by the inspirations of patriotism, and which are always listened to with so much attention and respect by every member of this House. On that occasion he said:

Sir, I have no appeal to make to democrats or republicans. I do not know what they may propose, still less what they may do, for the relief of the country. I do not rest my faith in them. My hope is not there. I have an ever-abiding faith which I think will be realized elsewhere. I salute the august majesty of the people that stands behind them; the people who know their stake in the country and their way out of it. their way out of it.

And in the same speech the same distinguished gentleman made the confession that from some cause his own people did not enjoy the same prosperity that they seemed to have ten years ago. It would not be a violent presumption to suppose that every Representative in this Congress would, if called upon, make the same melancholy confession. It is an unquestionable fact that the people are in distress;

fession. It is an unquestionable fact that the people are in distress; and it is equally unquestionable that they demand relief, and they demand it of their Representatives in Congress.

There is great prostration of business in every part of the country, and there is no present prospect of its revival. Trade is paralyzed and failures in commercial life are continually occurring; and these distressing events are producing discontent and clamor among the people. The cry of distress comes up to this Capitol from every city and town and hamlet in the land. Something ought to be done to alleviate this distress and to impart vitality to the stagnant waters of commerce and of business. of commerce and of business.

The origination of measures which would certainly give relief to The origination of measures which would certainly give rener to the country would be far more grateful to the people than the excite-ments of an amnesty debate or the passage of a centennial appropria-tion. If something of a remedial character is not done, there will be a commotion and an agitation among the masses of our countrymen not unlike the convulsions that shake the earth when the fabled Euceladus turns himself over beneath the everlasting mountains.

The impression prevails among the people that they have not been fairly dealt with in the legislation of the last few years, and it must be confessed that an examination of some of that legislation is well calculated to give color to that accusation. A law was never enacted more disastrously injurious to the interests of the toiling millions of this country than the resumption law of the last Congress. The passage of such a law may well revive in our memories the remark of the venerable chancellor to his diffident son: "Come, my son, and learn by how little wisdom the world is governed."

by how little wisdom the world is governed."

Compulsory resumption laws have always been signal failures. Their utter futility is made perfectly transparent in the clear light of history. It is a fact, known to every intelligent financier and politician, and one that has been referred to time and again in discussions had on finance years ago in this House, that the Bank of England suspended specie payments in 1797 and did not resume until 1823, and during that period resumption could not be coerced by legislation. During that suspension the day was fixed about eight different times when the people should pay specie; and the result every time was to run up the price of gold, ruin business men, and paralyze trade; and the laws requiring resumption at a fixed period had to be modified or repealed for the relief of the country.

General Jackson issued his "specie circular" in 1836; and multiplied thousands now living remember with painful distinctness the plentiful crop of financial ruin and disaster which it brought forth in 1837. ful crop of financial ruin and disaster which it brought forth in 1837. A resumption law compelling a return to specie payments on a fixed day in the future necessarily leads to an unhealthy contraction of the currency. It has always done so in the past and will always most certainly do so in the future. The calamities of nations are the lessons of history; and we are exceedingly unwise if we fail to profit by this specie-resumption lesson. Under the operation of the resumption law now in force the currency has already been contracted about $42,000,000, as stated by Treasurer New, and it has been brought about by the surrender of circulation by the national banks and by the accumulation of greenbacks by those banks for purposes of ultimate resumption or for the redemption of their circulation.

Let us at once remove this congressional guillotine which has already taken so much of the blood of life from our business community. If that odious law is not repealed its operation or prospective

If that odious law is not repealed its operation or prospective nity. If that odious law is not repealed its operation or prospective execution will lead to an indirect confiscation of a large portion of the property of the people. It is also obnoxious to the charge of class legislation; for, whether so intended or not, it is manifestly in the interest of the money power of the country. The holders of money can well afford to let it remain for several years in their strong boxes unemployed, in order that they may invest it in property after it has depreciated at least one half in value. They can well afford to submit to present temporary inconvenience in the certain and confident expectation of reaping great and permanent advantages in the future. They well know that property sold under the sheriff's hammer never brings its full value, and they well know how to take advantage of the follies and necessities of both provident and improvident

And the effect of such a law is such that the apprehension of its operation always leads to a panic and loss of confidence among the people. There is something mysterious and unaccountable about a people. There is something mysterious and unaccountable about a panic. We are told in the ancient mythologies that Pan commanded the armies of Bacchus when he invaded India, and that, while the superstitious Indians endured without trepidation the thunderbolts of the Titans, yet when Pan caused his sharp and shrill voice to reverberate among the surrounding mountains they fled in disorder and with dastardly precipitation. And from this circumstance we derive our word "panic." Let us guard against such legislation as alarms the people and arrests the steady progress of beneficent industry. And in addition to this cause of our present distress, our circulating medium had been reduced more than $1,000,000,000 previous to the passession of the progression of the p sage of the resumption law; and this was a contraction of the eurrency seldom if ever equaled in the annals of history. This was foreseen by many of our statesmen, for during the discussions in Congress on the Treasury-note bill in 1862 it was then stated that after the termination of the war one thousand millions of Treasury notes would be funded in United States bonds, and that the result would be a great contraction of the currency and great distress in the country; and Mr. Brooks, of New York, had the candor to declare that his try; and Mr. Brooks, of New York, had the candor to declare that his constituents would reap a golden harvest from that distress; that they made large gains from the follies and errors of others. It is to be hoped that no part of the country will be permitted to get any advantage over any other part of it by the unwise legislation of the present Congress. If it be possible, let it correct the gross errors and manifest blunders of the past. At any rate, let it refrain from perpetrating any more blunders, for in politics a blunder is said to be greater than a crime.

That the currency has been contrasted to the event stated and

That the currency has been contracted to the extent stated, and even beyond it, was conclusively demonstrated by my colleague [Mr. Bright] in a speech delivered in this House on the 28th day of March, 1874. In that speech he said:

On the 31st of August, 1865, we had $2,193,395,627 of currency. On the 1st of November, 1873, we had $631,488,677, making a reduction of $1,560,966,851, or an annual reduction during eight years of $195,133,356.

I prepared a table several months ago in which was shown at that time the amount of currency in circulation in the great trading and commercial nations of the world, the population of those nations, and the circulation per capita among their people. That table is not exactly correct at this time, of course, but it approximates correctness, and is sufficiently accurate to illustrate the proposition that I desire to enforce; and that table is as follows:

Circulation.	Popula- tion.	Per capita.
$1, 509, 000, 000 683, 000, 000 704, 000, 000 587, 700, 000	36, 000, 000 32, 000, 000 40, 000, 000 41, 000, 000	$42 00 21 00 18 00 15 00
	$1, 509, 000, 000 683, 000, 000 704, 000, 000	$1,509,000,000 36,000,000 683,000,000 32,000,000 704,000,000 40,000,000

It will be seen at a glance that those of the above-named nations which have the largest circulation per capita enjoy the greatest financial prosperity, and the actual facts show it.

The amount of circulation per capita in the United States since 1862 has been as follows: In 1862, $21; in 1863, $27; in 1864, $28; in 1865, $27; in 1866, $23; in 1867, $22.80; in 1868, $21; in 1869, $20; and in 1875, $15, which is less than it was in 1857.

The argument presented by these figures is simply overwhelming, and they flash conviction upon every unprejudiced mind. They make it as clear as the light of the meridian sun that the greatest prosperity it as clear as the light of the meridian sun that the greatest prosperity of this country was contemporaneous with its largest monetary circulation; and the fact is patent to all that that prosperity has declined in a geometrical ratio with the depletion of the currency.

I would inquire, then, what action is necessary on the part of Congress to restore our lost prosperity? It is, most unquestionably, an increase of the volume of the currency, either by such legislation as will mobilize and put in circulation what currency we have, a great part of which has been driven from the ordinary channels of business by the apprehensions excited by the "resumption law" or by such by the apprehensions excited by the "resumption law," or by such legislation as will actually add to the volume of circulation now outstanding. Perhaps legislation looking in both these directions would afford a more immediate, adequate, and efficacious remedy. There is not enough money in actual circulation to keep the great industrial and commercial interests of the country in a state of healthy activity. The exigencies of the times demand more currency, inflation if you please; not unlimited inflation, but a sound and healthful inflation. I am frank to say that I do not want such an inflation of the currency as will necessarily cause its depreciation, for that or the currency as will necessarily cause its depreciation, for that would be swindling the people. I desire a currency properly adjusted to the business operations of the people, and not such a redundancy of it as will derange the values of all property and make of trade and commerce a mere game of chance. I want no confederate money, no assignat plethora, no superfluity of currency, but just that quantity which the business experience of this country has demonstrated to be essential to its commercial activity and its general, material, and industrial presperity. industrial prosperity.

The French have a specie circulation of $1,250,000,000, because they The French have a specie circulation of $1,250,000,000, because they cannot be induced to deposit their money in bank and transact their business by checks, as do the people of England and America; and, in addition to that, the Bank of France, on the 30th of September, 1875, had a circulation of $484,000,000; making in all a circulation of $1,734,000,000. Although France emerged five years ago from one of the most disastrous and desolating wars of ancient or modern times, yet to-day she enjoys a greater degree of thrift and internal prosperity than any of the leading commercial nations of the world, greater even than Germany, to whom she has paid within that period $1,000,000,000.

While other causes may, and no doubt did in some measure, con-

While other causes may, and no doubt did in some measure, contribute to this result, yet I would respectfully inquire if her volume of currency, fully adequate at all times to the demands and exigencies of trade and of business, has not been a tremendous factor of power in the achievement of her unexampled prosperity? The mere statement of the proposition cannot fail to flash conviction upon every unprejudiced mind.

The idea seems to obtain that an increase in the volume of the currency will necessarily lead to its depreciation; but it is manifest to the impartial reasoner that this result will not follow if the currency has a firm and substantial basis. There is no more necessity for the depreciation of the value of paper money, if its amount is constantly depreciation of the value of paper money, if its amount is constantly regulated with reference to the business operations of the people, than there is for the depreciation of gold and silver. The exchangeable value of gold and silver will diminish in proportion to the quantity in circulation; and so with a paper currency. The best support of a currency is not limitation, but receivability; and this rule applies with equal force to specie and paper money.

I am fortunate in being able to fortify this statement by remarks made by Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, in this House on the 6th day of February, 1862. He then said:

All contracts are made not only with a view to present laws, but subject to the future legislation of the country. We have more than once changed the value of coin. Neither our gold nor silver coin is as valuable as it was fifty years ago. Congress in 1853, I believe, regulated the weight and value of silver. They debased it over 7 per cent. and made it a legal tender.

And again he said on the same day:

Increase gold and silver beyond the amount needed, and you depreciate its value. Such inflation of the currency is just as injurious as if it were in paper, so far as raising prices and stimulating speculation are concerned.

And he quotes the following language of McCulloch, whom he characterizes as "one of the most learned of writers on that subject:"

By reducing the supply of notes below the supply of coin that would circulate in their place were they withdrawn, their value may be raised above the value of gold, while by increasing them to a greater extent it is proportionably lowered.

In 1770 the annual production of gold and silver was only about $30,000,000, while the annual yield at this time is about $200,000,000, or an increase of sixfold in a century. When America was discovered the total annual production of the precious metals in Christendom was only about $300,000, and the total stock on hand was only about $200,000,000, while the present stock of coin in Christendom is about $3,000,000,000. We now dig as much gold and silver from the earth every year as all Eprope had in 1792; and the stock of coin has increased in Christendom some two hundred and fifty fold, while the population has not increased fivefold. I am indebted for these facts to Hittell's History of Culture, and the following is an extract from that work:

But commerce has gained more than our stock of coin, and money is now used far more extensively. * * The effect of the increase of the precious metals has been to cause a rise in the market price of labor and of the products of labor; and an ounce of silver is now worth relatively about one twenty-fifth part as much as it was in 1500.

What was the result of this great increase in the annual production of gold and silver? Why, sir, an era of unexampled prosperity. The opening of the gold placers of the Sacramento basin and the silver lodes of Nevada has led to a development of the Pacific slope, an accumulation of wealth, and an acceleration of the general progress of civilization in America unparalleled in the annals of history. Commerce has been duplicated and reduplicated, agriculture has been stimulated, emigration has been encouraged, and every material and industrial interest has been promoted. The silver and golden stream, like the ancient Pactolus, has poured its profusion of wealth into the lap of stagnant trade and discouraged industry; and the energies of a young nation revived and shook their invincible locks like a giant refreshed from his slumbers. A large part of our broad domain which before was a barren wilderness became a veritable "garden of the

A similar state of prosperity was produced by the generous circulation which the country enjoyed in 1865, 1866, and 1867. The instrumentality by which that generous circulation can be restored is neither dubious nor difficult. What has produced prosperity in the past will most certainly produce it again. Instead of retiring the legal-tenders, let their present amount be enlarged. An English authority on finance, which I do not now remember, declares that the monetary circulation required by every country to carry on its multifarious business enterprises is an amount equal to three times the sum that will defray the expenses of its government, economically administered. If our annual expenditure is $300,000,000, our permanent circulation should be $900,000,000. And by the census of 1870 the gold and silver and paper money of the country amounted to $900,000,000, an amount fully adequate to the demands of trade and the wants of the business community, if it were in circulation. A proposition was made during the discussion of the Treasury-note bills in 1862 and 1862 that the resimple of the results are not the results. in 1862 and 1863 that the minimum of circulation among the people should be fixed at $20 per capita. It would be wise at this time to convert that proposition into a law, which, like those of the Medes and Persians, should be irrepealable. Under this rule our circulation would rersians, should be irrepealable. Under this rule our circulation would approach $900,000,000, as our population is near forty-five million; while in fact it is only $714,000,000, and really less than that by at least $150,000,000 through the effect of the fears and apprehensions caused by the resumption law. Even $714,000,000 only gives $18 per capita. The actual circulation among our people is less than $15 per capita, while in France and Great Britain, the most prosperous nations on the globe, it is over $20 per capita, as has been previously shown.

In a letter to the New York Tribune, dated September 11, 1875, the late Secretary of the Treasury, Hugh McCulloch, makes the following proposition:

If I were a member of Congress, my first act would be to introduce a bill making the United States notes at once convertible into bonds bearing interest at the rate of 4 or 4½ per cent. in gold, with a provision that bank-notes to an amount equal to the notes which may thus be retired may be issued, if required by the banks; and that from and after the 1st day of January, 1878, the United States notes shall cease to be a legal tender.

We have had enough legislation already in the interest of the banks and of the money power of the country. What is now imperatively demanded is legislation in the interest of the people, in the interest of the toiling millions, whose cries for relief are continually heard at the doors of this Capitol.

Any legislation by this or any other Congress which would add to the interest-carrying debt of the nation, or which would convert a non-interest-bearing obligation into one carrying interest, would be considered, and justly so, as a fraud upon the people. It is the tremendous interest-bearing debt of the nation which imposes so onerous a tax upon the labor of the country. We have no monarchy, no ous a tax upon the labor of the country. We have no monarchy, no aristocracy, and no church establishment in this country by name; but, in reality, we have something that is nearly as bad. Great Britain has all these splendid appendages of power, and yet the yearly cost of her government is only $517,000,000; while the yearly cost of the governments in the United States, national, State, county, and municipal, is the enormous sum of $640,000,000, which is about one-fourth of the value of one artire error raised in the country. The enormous nicipal, is the enormous sum of $640,000,000, which is about one-fourth of the value of one entire crop raised in the country. The amount of the cost of government is the same in the United States as in England, being $16 per capita. It is inimical to the genius of republican institutions that their governments should be gorgeous and splendid. It was wisely said by Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, who, in the earlier and purer days of this Republic presided as Speaker over the deliberations of this House, "that republican governments should be poor and the people rich."

We may well profit, as we have already done to some considerable extent, by the maxim of this Cato of American politics, and reduce it to a wholesome practice by the diminution of salaries and expenditures generally, and evince a disposition, at least, to turn over a new tures generally, and evince a disposition, at least, to turn over a new leaf in our governmental history, and return to the good old ways of republican simplicity. It is high time to inaugurate the "evangelical politics of love and charity and good will to man," and to limit the action of the Government to the exercise of the fewest possible funcnothing by legislative intervention for the people that the people can possibly do for themselves without the aid of the Government. It is the mission of the democratic party to confine the Government to its the mission of the democratic party to confine the Government to its primary ends, which are the protection of the life, liberty, and property of its citizens. The republican party embraces to a very large extent the paternal theory of government, and thereby enlarges its functions, so that they embrace by far too many details in the ramifications of society; and corruption and maladministration are the inevitable result. There are, and will be, corrupt men in all political experiencies, but the democratic party has always and political experiences. cal organizations; but the democratic party has always had, and always will have, this immeasurable advantage over the republican party, that its principles do not necessarily engender corruption as do those of the republican party. The democratic party prevents an incalculable amount of mal-administration by leaving the secondary ends of government to private enterprise and private beneficence. The democratic party may in some instances be compelled to depart from its fundamental principles of action by previous bad and unauthorized legislation, for which it was in no way responsible. In his speech on the centennial appropriation, January 25, 1876, Mr. Thompson, of Massachusetts, enunciated a political maxim which any political party may be justified in adopting on extraordinary occasions; and it is this

An unconstitutional act may create constitutional obligations. A government may be justly called upon to repair the injury its unauthorized acts have done.

The class of cases to which this maxim applies is the only class that justifies the blending of the primary with the secondary ends of government. An instrument cannot be employed advantageously both as a razor and a carving-knife. If so employed, it will neither shave so well nor carve so well. And the same principle applies to the government. There is positively not enough public virtue in this country to carry on the Government without malpractice and corruption if both its primary and secondary ends are embraced within the scope of its authority and administration.

We are one of the most heavily taxed nations in the world as the result of our departure from the true theory and practice of a republican government. Every hardy son of toil in the land feels the weight of this heavy taxation; and it is a religious duty to reduce it and even to remove it if it can possibly be done. We need in this high forum of national legislation representatives who have the capacity and the heart to be touched by a feeling sense of the wants and the sufferings of the people, and who have at the same time the nerve and the determination to propose and to champion that legislation which will meet those wants and alleviate those sufferings.

which will meet those wants and alleviate those sufferings.

An election to Congress is the political mint which places upon the citizen the stamp of representation, and it imposes the discharge of a great duty and the burden of a heavy responsibility. His distinction and his welcome plaudit from a grateful people come and they come alone from the honest and faithful discharge of that duty and the full and adequate meeting of that responsibility. It is the amount of duty done and the extent of his honorable achievements in the inof duty done and the extent of his honorable achievements in the interest of the people that twine the laurel and the chaplet of fame around the statesman's brow. His credentials do not confer upon him a personal decoration, but they are a badge of his servitude to the people, and not a title of nobility. Instead of elevating him above the people they constitute him a servant of the people. The Author of our holy religion, when he girded Himself with a towel and washed the feet of His disciples, promulgated the new gospel of duty which must be accepted and acted upon by every public man who hopes to meet the just expectations of his constituency, and that gospel is this:

If any man would be great among you, let him be your minister; and if any man would be chief among you, let him be servant of all.

And are we such representatives? The work proposed and perfected by this Congress will show whether we are or not. If the people have not such representatives on this floor at this time, they will have them here at a period in the future not very far distant.

An overwhelming majority of the people demand that every dollar of the bonded debt of the United States, except where by the terms of the laws under which they were created they are expressly made payable in coin, should be paid in non-interest-bearing Treasury notes; and they demand the repeal of all subsequent legislation pledging the faith and credit of the nation to a different mode of payment from that contemplated when the debts were created, whenever it can be done without impairing vested rights or the obligation of contracts. They desire and they demand the benefit of all rights and equities which they may have in regard to the national debt, of which they have not been deprived by the operative force of constitutional provisions. And these demands are not unreasonable, nor are they unjust to the creditors of the nation.

If the whole of the national debt were paid off in legal-tender Treasury notes, there is no just ground to believe that any loss would be entailed on the holders of those notes. Our circulation in that event would be but little greater than that of France, and her paper passes to-day almost at par among her people. Our circulation is nearly one-third less than that of France, and it is at a discount of 12 per cent. or more. There is some radical defect somewhere in our financial system, and it is our duty to ascertain what that defect is and then to correct it. In my opinion the defect consists in the fact that Congress has uniformly discriminated against her own currency by ambidextrous legislation: by preferring gold to her own Treasury notes, which by her own creative fiat were made legal tenders in the payment of debts. If a trader dishonors his own paper, he may reasonably expect that other people will do the same. If the Government imprints the stamp of inferiority upon her own paper by giving a preference to other currency, it is a reasonable expectation that the sagacity of the business community will lead to the maintenance if not to the extension of that inferiority and depreciation.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, in the discussions in this House in February, 1862, which were contemporaneous with the creation of the Treasury notes, used the following language:

What else are Bank of England notes than bills of credit of the government? Her whole capital consists of government securities, and her issues are based on that alone.

* * Had they been made an absolute tender, they would not have depreciated a farthing. * * * Prussia holds the currency in paper issuable by government alone, and is always at par.

And I desire here to say parenthetically that the same distinguished gentleman, who was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, declared in a colloquy with Mr. Spalding of Ohio, on the 23d day of June, 1864:

The bonds (five-twenties) are made payable in money by the express terms of the law, and if legal-tender notes are money then the bonds are payable in that. * * I say that no man who is a lawyer—and I could not say that the Secretary of the Treasury is not a lawyer—who will carefully read the law, can possibly come to any other conclusion than that the principal of these 5.20 bonds is payable in currency.

Treasury notes to the amount of at least $1,000,000,000,000, which is not far from the amount of currency actually needed to carry on the business of this country, should always be at par, if predicated on the faith, credit, wealth, and pecuniary responsibility of a great nation of unlimited resources like that of the United States of America. What is it that gives value and circulation to the notes of a private individual? Is it not his solvency and character as a business man? In 1870 the property in the United States was valued at $30,000,000,000,000. Our national debt exceeds $2,000,000,000. Ought not Treasury notes to the amount of $2,000,000,000, to be always at par? They would be so if there was confidence in the public mind in the solvency and in the durability of the Government. An individual who is in debt to no greater extent than one-fifteenth of the value of his property would be regarded abundantly solvent by the most timid moneylender; and the argument carries additional force when applied to a Government no more in debt than that, provided there exists confidence in the durability of that Government. And have we not confidence in the permanency of our Government? If Milton was correct when he said that "liberty in its last analysis is but the blood of the brave," then in America she rests upon imperishable foundations.

While the late war between the States was a conjugation of most of the dreadful evils that can afflict the body-politic; and while on many accounts it will be forever deplored by the philanthropist and true patriot, yet that bloody war, although it has left the shadow of the death angel upon nearly every hearth-stone in the land, was not an unmixed evil. Like every severe affliction, it has at least one jewel in its bloody crown; and account on that every devoted lover of his country will return his devout thanks to Almighty God that it has come, and that it has gone; for it has forever settled the one fundamental principle of this Government. It has forever settled, as nothing but the terrible divinity of war could have forever settled, the great and overshadowing question, a question involving all other questions, of the unity and indivisibility of this Government.

Ever since the convention of 1787 there had been a difference of opinion among the most profound statesmen of the country as to the nature and character of its government. There were two antagonistic theories of constitutional interpretation. Most southern men believed their allegiance due, in the first instance, to their States and not to the General Government. They religiously believed, as the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799 asserted, that in the event of a contest between the States and the General Government the States were the "judges of the mode and the measure of redress." They believed, in the language of the letter of Edward Everett accepting the vice-presidential nomination on the Bell ticket in 1860, that this was a government whose action and existence depended "upon the voluntary co-operation of the various parts." Most northern statesmen believed the reverse. The two ideas were irreconcilable, and their constant discussion, provoked by the tariff in 1828 and by the various phases of the slavery question from 1820 to 1861, was fraught with imminent peril to the integrity of the Government and was a standing menace to the life of the Republic. The advocates of the one doctrine were doubtless as sincere and patriotic as the advocates of the other; but the question was one which could never have been determined in the forum of debate. The law and the politics of such a question, involving as it did the very existence of a great nation, could only have been settled by the bloody arbitrament of the sword. As the war of the Revolution, in the language of Mr. Webster, "was fought against a preamble," so the war between the States was fought pon an idea; and the northern phase of the idea has prevailed, and the doctrine of "peaceable secession" has been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets, and been completely abandoned by every sane southern man. That doctrine now hangs out conspicuously upon the curtain of the past the banners of everlasting defeat. The great doctrine of State rights

But the doctrine of State sovereignty, which carried in its bosom the doctrine of secession and prior State allegiance, has been generally disavowed and repudiated; and the time may come when a representative man from the South will arise in his place in this high forum of the people's collective majesty and announce to the nation, as it has been done in some measure during the present Congress, the deliberate judgment of the southern people themselves that it was well for their own future prosperity and for the common glory of a common country that this great question was settled against them. Such a representative can truthfully say that they now accept the result as the fiat of the Almighty and that to a perpetual union they have sworn a perpetual allegiance. Unkind and provoking allusions to the bitter past may set their feelings in motion, but they stand like one of those old rocking-stones of the Druids, for the power of Hercules can never disturb their equilibrium.

The principle is now irrevocably fixed in and made a part of the southern heart and mind, as the immutable result of the late civil strife, as the decision of no earthly judicial tribunal could ever have fixed it, that this Government is a nation, with full and ample power to prevent disintegration and dismemberment and to secure by the most decided measures its unity, indivisibility, durability, and perpetuity. And the earnest and fervent prayer of patriots North and patriots South, "regardless of the credentials of party or the pass-words of creed," now and henceforth, will ever be that our common country may—

Like some tall tree, erect its lofty form, Green in the sun and blossom in the storm; Long in its shade may children's children come, And welcome earth's poor wanderers to a home; Long may it live, and every blast defy, Till time's last whirlwind shakes the vaulted sky.

It is superlatively absurd, Mr. Speaker, to say that such a government does not afford ample security for the whole amount of circulating medium required to carry on the business operations of its citizens. Confederate money and the assignats of France depreciated because they had no such security, no such solid basis, no permanent and established governments to sustain them and inspire confidence in their value.

That the capitalists of this country do have confidence in both the solvency and durability of the Government is conclusively shown by the fact that what are called the "currency sixes," issued to the Pacific railway companies under the acts of July 1, 1862, and July 4, 1834, command higher prices in the New York money market than the bonds of the Government which are payable, both principal and interest, in gold by the express terms of the laws under which they were issued. The reason of this is fully explained by a letter of Mr. W. W. Corcoran, of this city, a financier and philanthropist whose reputation is co-extensive with the limits of his country, in which letter he says, (and I am well assured in my own mind that he will pardon the use I now make of it:)

I beg leave to state that the United States gold sixes are due before 1881, and can be redeemed by the United States at sundry times prior to that date. The United States currency sixes are payable thirty years after date, and will mature from 1895 to 1899, and are not redeemable before maturity. My opinion, therefore, is that the difference in the time the loans have to run makes the difference in their market value in favor of the longer loan. The currency bonds are payable, principal and interest, in currency.

These currency bonds are worth more than gold to-day; and this fact I desire to be well remembered for a purpose that will be fully stated hereafter.

If the Treasury notes were not discriminated against by the legislation of the country, they would be of equal value with gold and silver, and would be preferred by the people in the conduct of their business operations. If these discriminations were removed, and if the notes of the national banks were superseded by Treasury notes made a legal tender in the payment of all debts, then there would be less necessity for an increase of the currency by positive and affirmative legislation, for the reason that such measures would, by the operation of their inherent power, break the great gold gorge which now obstructs the circulation of specie, and the gold and silver would come out of the bank vaults and money-chests and flow freely in the currents of trade and commerce. Their withdrawal from business renders them as inert for purposes of practical utility as if they were still hidden in the bosom of the primeval rock of their mountain homes. The actual fact is that the hoarding of the precious metals exerts a powerful positive influence in the direction of commercial and financial stagnation; for strength unexerted is an element of weakness. It is no more strength than a bushel of acorns is a forest of oaks.

If the entire currency consisted of legal-tenders, a redundancy could be very easily prevented by appropriate legislation, even if that currency amounted to $1,500,000,000. The convertibility of the legal-tenders into a Government stock carrying a rate of interest that would always render it equal to gold or superior to it, as has just been shown to be the case with the "currency sixes," would completely solve this most difficult problem in the arithmetic of the American statesman. That such would be the happy result was the opinion of a financier to whom may be applied without exaggeration the encomium pronounced by Daniel Webster upon Alexander Hamilton:

pronounced by Daniel Webster upon Alexander Hamilton:

He struck the dead corse of public credit, and it rose to its feet. He struck the rock of public resources, and abundant streams of revenue flowed forth.

In his dissenting opinion in the Legal-tender cases, in 12 Wallace's Reports, Chief Justice Chase says:

The best support for note-circulation is not limitation but receivability, especially for loans bearing coin interest. * * * It is plain that a currency so supported cannot depreciate more than the loans; in other words, below the general credit of the country. It will rise or fall with it. At the present moment, if the notes were received for 5 per cent. bonds they would be at par. In other words, specie payments would be resumed.

The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] unites with the late Chief Justice in deploring the legislation by which the convertibility of Treasury notes into interest-bearing bonds was destroyed. A circulation so supported would be equal in value at least, if not superior, to a metallic currency at once, without any unwise and mischievous legislation fixing a date for the forced resumption of specie payments. And then the tremendous power of contracting and expanding the currency of the country would be taken from the legislative forum and confided to the people in their majesty of sovereignty, where such a power can only properly and legitimately belong. This fearful agency should by all means be removed from Congress.

Why cannot democrats of every shade of opinion unite in the adoption of such measures as will forever vest the people with the power and with the responsibility of the regulation of the amount of the circulating medium? It does seem to me that this is a platform upon which all can stand and see the salvation of the democratic party and of the country. This is the platform upon which an overwhelming majority of the people of the United States now stand or soon will

The statesman who has been stationed upon the lofty peaks of political observation and who is at all skilled in political meteorology cannot fail to have noted the coming wave of popular sentiment on this great question. By placing our ears to the ground, like the unturored Indian in his native forest, any of us may hear in the distance the tramp of the teeming millions as they come to align themselves on this new and great issue, an issue that will subordinate all other

It was wisely remarked by Lord Bacon that a great question will always be discussed, agitated, and settled sooner or later. It was so with the slavery question, and it will be so with the financial question. It will not down at our bidding. It is vital in every part, and will not submit to annihilation. It is a question of omnipotence in politics; and if the democratic party should not, after a fair and impartial trial, prove itself adequate to the satisfactory solution of the great problem, there is imminent danger that the masses of the people may address themselves to the responsible task of organizing a party, as they now threaten to do in the Northwest, that will be competent for its final settlement. At this late epoch of the world's civilization, many of the most advanced political thinkers are abandoning their old and worn-out theories in regard to hard money, which is acknowledged to be an impossible currency in periods of panic and financial disaster, when there exists the greatest necessity for its free circulation. So many new facts have accumulated in the history of finance as to necessitate a revision of the hasty inductions heretofore made from limited facts; and some of the most enthusiastic advocates of a metallic currency are gradually announcing their adhesion to the proposition that "in a well-governed country the credit of the state is the highest form known," and that "the credit of the governments of Great Britain or the United States is worth more than

I am well aware that doubts are entertained by many as to the constitutional power of our Government to issue in times of peace Treasury notes which shall be a legal tender. If these doubts are so general and of such a character as to embarrass and obstruct wholesome legislation for the relief of the country, then the gravity of the situation is such as fully to justify the adoption of a constitutional amendment which shall expressly and unquestionably confer that power. Permit me in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to say that the democratic party, in the past history of this Republic, has gloriously vindicated its character as the friend and the champion of the dearest rights of the people. It is too late in the day for that party to take a step backward. It must show itself equal to the present emergency, and demonstrate the fact to the people that it is a progressive democracy, and keeps itself fully abreast of the great questions of the age. The democratic party of to-day is not the democratic party of 1856 or of 1861; but it is a new and renovated party, combining in organic and harmonious union the conservative and vital elements of the old whig and democratic parties. It has often been said that the democratic party had the "best principles while the whig party had the best men;" and it may be justly claimed for the democratic party of to-day that its high and earnest endeavor is to employ its "best men" for the illustration and enforcement of its "best principles."

I myself was brought up in the lap of the whig party, and nurtured in the school of Henry Clay; yet I am heartily in accord with the democratic party as it is now constituted, and take special pride in enrolling myself as a humble soldier in her serried ranks as they move forward, under skillful leadership, to assume the government of this distracted land, forever henceforth "carrying the flag and making step to the music of a restored and rehabilitated Union." The name itself carries with it a charm and a magic spell, and for effect and popularity, it is superior to any other in the political nomenclature of the country. It strikes a responsive chord in the patriotic hearts of the American people; and in every political contest a "single blast of its bugle horn" is worth at least one hundred thousand days when the fathers snaped its policy under the guidance of wisdom and the inspiration of patriotism.

There is no substantial reason why every member of the old whig party, which was always a party of conservatism and nationality, should not cordially co-operate with this new democracy in its_laudable efforts to restore the administration of the Government to that simplicity, economy, and purity which characterized it in those early days when the fathers shaped its policy under the guidance of wisdom and the inspiration of patriotism.

The distinctive doctrines which separated those grand old parties have been authoritatively settled by the arbitrament of time and the logic of events. And permit me to say further, that it detracts nothing from the glories of the old whig party that it has lost its name in the vicissitudes of our political history; just as it detracts nothing from the dignity of the Missouri River that she loses her name when her turbid waters mingle with those of the Mississippi. In measuring the longest rivers from the sea, geographers will always consider the Missouri as an inseparable part of the Mississippi; and so, when the future historian shall seize his pen to write the history of American liberty and chronicle the imperishable services rendered by the political parties of the country to the cause of free institutions, he will be compelled to consider the Missouri of whiggery as an inseparable part of the Mississippi of democracy; and he will note the fact that their coalescing streams have, in their onward flow, deposited impurity after impurity of political doctrine; that they have cleared themselves like rivers as they run to the sea, and that they have equally contributed to the political fertility and renovation of our common country.

Upon the appearance of the great dragon of adverse power in the shape of the republican party, the democratic party, like "the woman clothed with the sun," mentioned in the Book of Revelations, was forced to retire into the wilderness, and for fourteen long years remained in a state of hybernation or suspended animation. But in the last general election she was breathed upon in her temporary grave by the holy spirit of the "evangelical politics of love and charity and good-will to man;" the same politics that was proclaimed to the shepherds as they watched their flocks by night on the plains of Judea eighteen hundred and seventy-five years ago; and she rose to life in this Congress by the power of a glorious resurrection. And in bursting the cerements of her political tomb like Lazarus she left behind her the old napkins of obsolete political doctrine and the contaminating heresies of the dead past, and she came forth clad in the new and pure flesh of incorruptible principle. To-day she stands a new and a vizorous plant grafted upon the live old stocks of the best principles and most sacred traditions of a glorious past; and under the genial influences of increasing popular favor she will in the near future adorn herself with a foliage more vital and more glorious than that of 1787. But in order that she may achieve so grand a destiny she must revise some of her hasty inductions upon the great financial questions of our politics and conform to the spirit of a new age which has been superinduced by an advancing civilization. The Bourbon element, which learns nothing and forgets nothing, has no place in the creed of a progressive democracy. I believe it was Coleridge who said:

If men could learn from history, what lessons it might teach them. But passion and party blind their eyes; and the light which experience gives is a lantern on the stern which shines only on the waves behind them.

It was Bolingbroke who said:

History is nothing but philosophy teaching by example.

And it was Burke who said:

Example is the school of mankind and they will learn at no other.

The true American politician can never fully meet his responsibilities unless he has learned that philosophy which is taught in the school of example, and unless he has been illumined by that light which emanates from the lantern of experience.

But all great changes in politics and in the principles of government must, like those in the great realm of nature, necessarily be of slow growth. The complete relief of a suffering and oppressed people cannot be accomplished by a single act of legislation, just as Atalanta could not finish the race and seize the golden apple at a single bound. A beginning must be made and the grand result reached after many approximations toward the highest attainable good, and the highest attainable good is ever the aim of the practical and the enlightened statesman.

The financial measures proposed by the democratic party in the present Congress must be founded on this wise maxim of true statesmanship. If they do not embody the highest good, they must embody the highest attainable good at the present time, or they will fail to command the support and the approbation of the people. Political truth, like all other truth, is a polygon. It has many sides, and, like the moon, but one phase is presented to the world at a time. As knowledge advances and mankind with it, new phases of truth, new sides of the polygon, will become visible, until finally the whole circle of truth will be completed, and the political inductions of the race will attain the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential train the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential train the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential train the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential train the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential train the pagest possible approximation to perfection and infolential trains the pagest possible approximation to perfect the property of the prop will attain the nearest possible approximation to perfection and infallibility A beginning must be made by the democratic party, and she must demonstrate her good intentions to the country by such legislation as will manifestly be in the interest of the toiling millions whose consistent champion she has ever been, and not in the interest of the privileged and favored few at the expense of the suffering many. If such an auspicious beginning shall be made during the present session of Congress, it may with safety be written down in the political annals as the sure word of prophecy that the democratic party, as the faithful representative of the progressive political sentiment of the nation, will, sooner or later, be clothed with "the lawn of office and the staff" of supreme authority; and when she does come into power, as come she assuredly will, she will come charged with the imperative command of the people to remove the carcasses of political corruption from the highways and the byways of the Government and to inaugurate in the purified temples of constitutional liberty the reign of a purer public morality and of a nobler political administration. And when she shall be so invested with power, the prayer of every true demo-cratic heart will ever be that she may forever stand upon the Appian ways of the Constitution, never trusting any man, even of her own political faith, any further than the Constitution trusts him, and that she may continue to administer the "evangelical politics of love and charity and good-will to man" in this "western appendix of civiliza-ion" down to the last period of recorded time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me, before he resumes his seat, to ask him a question or two with regard to some of his statements, in which his calculations are different from mine?

Mr. RIDDLE. Certainly.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know whether or not the gentleman in his calculation of the per capita of currency includes any of the interest-bearing bonds or obligations of the Government?

Mr. RIDDLE. No, sir.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. And in the second place I want to know whether in his calculation he makes any allowance for the deposits in the banks as affecting the business of the country?
Mr. RIDDLE. No, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. And my third question is, will the gentleman be good enough to state what is the reason why the legal-tenders are now below par?

Mr. RIDDLE. I have stated that most fully in my speech.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I was not aware that the gentleman had done so

Mr. RIDDLE. It is because the Government places on them the stamp of inferiority and discredits its own paper.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. In what way?

Mr. RIDDLE. By refusing to receive them in payment of all debts.

Mr. KELLEY. And if the gentleman will permit me, I would add—or in exchange for its bonds.

Mr. RIDDLE. Certainly; or in exchange for its bonds.

IMPROVEMENT OF CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, nearly all of the speeches which have been made during the present session when the House has been in Committee of the Whole were on the currency question. Their views have been various and their opinions very diverse. The people of the country are very much interested in that question, I admit. On a country are very much interested in that question, I admit. On a sound system of finance very much depends the prosperity of the country. But I propose to-day to change the programme a little, and speak about the improvement of some of the great natural highways of the country, upon which I think very much of the growth, prosperity, and development of the country depend.

During the last Congress I procured an appropriation for a survey of Smith's Shoals, in the Cumberland River, in the State of Kentucky. That survey was made in the latter part of 1874 by Mr. R. C. McCalla, assistant engineer, and his report will be found in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1875, in appendix R, on pages 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21. At this session I have introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to improve said shoals according to the plans and specifications of said report, and asking an appropriation plans and specifications of said report, and asking an appropriation of $70,000 to enable him to make said improvement. The committee will indulge me for a short time while I give some additional reasons, not in said report, for the improvement of said shoals.

You are well apprised of the importance of cheap transportation, and where there are natural highways of a national character they should be so improved as to give an outlet to the products of the counshould be so improved as to give an outlet to the products of the country through which they run, provided said improvements are practicable. However much we may differ as to the propriety of giving aid to the great artificial channels of commerce, no one, I dare say, now doubts the power of Congress to improve rivers running through more than one State, to improve rivers and harbors where the same is necessary to foster and protect commerce on the seaboard and to develop the resources of the country. The more you improve these arteries and make them navigable for all classes of vessels which can traverse them the more you develop the resources of the country; and traverse them, the more you develop the resources of the country; and the cheaper you carry those products to their respective markets, the cheaper they can be had by the consumer, and he is enabled to appropriate more of them to his own comfort, taste, and pleasure. I need not stop to argue that water transportation is the cheapest of all the kinds in use in this country. This arises from the fact that it is a natural highway; no daily wear and tear of this road-bed; no great outlay in constructing the same. It can be utilized in a hundred different ways, from the magnificent steamer freighted with the lives and ent ways, from the magnificent steamer freighted with the lives and property of men, down to the coal-barge and the rough log-raft. I will dwell no longer on these self-evident propositions.

Now the grand question is this: Is this such an improvement as should be made by the Government? Is it in the interest of trade and commerce, and will it bring material wealth to any considerable portion of the country? It is known to you all the Cumberland is one of the main branches of the Ohio River. Rising in the mountains of Kentucky, it runs for more than a hundred miles in Kentucky, then through a considerable portion of Tennessee, then back tucky, then through a considerable portion of Tennessee, then back into Kentucky, then empties into the Ohio River. Its whole length is about six hundred miles, and in winter and spring is navigable for two hundred miles for large first-class boats, and during the summer for small boats up to the foot of the shoals I am seeking to have imsmall boats up to the foot of the shoals I am seeking to have improved. It is such a stream as Congress should order improved, if there is wealth to be developed by so doing. There is then twelve hundred miles of coast on this river. Winding as it does through mountains and plains, it bears upon its bosom to the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers the rich products of this large extent of country. It is estimated that the commerce on this river above Nashville now amounts to $10,000,000 annually, and with some improvements, not costing half as much as is thrown away on one post-office building, the compares would reach double that amount.

the commerce would reach double that amount. These shoals obstruct the passage of coal-boats, rafts, &c., at all times of the year except when there is a high rise in the river, and this does not often occur; so that most of the time there is not sufficient tide to carry to market the inexhaustible supplies of coal and lumber above and adjacent to said shoals. There is over one million of acres and about twenty thousand square miles in extent of the country in whose bosom is embedded millions of dollars' worth of coal, and on whose bosom is embedded millions of dollars worth of coal, and on the surface of which is an inexhaustible supply of pine, poplar, and oak timber, which lies above and on either side of these shoals and is accessible, if there was any convenient way of getting to market those vast products. This country is rough, is sparsely inhabited; but if these inexhaustible products would be made available by means of transportation, then the population would double and treble in a short time. New mines would be opened, towns spring up, and great wealth would come to those who are now out off from a market wealth would come to those who are now cut off from a market for these products; and those who now look to these mines for their supply of coal and lumber would purchase the same for nearly one-half of the price they now pay.

Mr. Speaker, the number of flat-boat tides over these shoals will not average over three annually, and the number of boats is about eighty each season, carrying about six hundred and forty thousand bushels of coal; this is generally sold in the Nashville market at sixteen and one-half cents per bushel, thus yie.ding in gross about $100,000. Boatmen living on the river say there are on an average annually twenty-four boat-tides from the foot of the shoals down the river. Now, if the improvement proposed would quadruple the number of tides on the shoals, then you would have over two and a half millions of bushels of coal sent to market annually, and a return of $400,000 therefor. But it is reasonable to suppose, as the facilities for getting these products to market are increased, new mines would be opened, a much larger number of boats would be sent down each tide, and I do not regard it an extravagant estimate when I say there would be sent from these mines annually five or six millions of bushels of coal, yielding to the operatives and to the country at least $750,000. Nor is this all. There is now, when there is a high tide, large rafts of as fine timber and lumber as can be found anywhere floated down this fine timber and lumber as can be found anywhere floated down this stream. These would also be largely increased in number and value, so that, with this improvement made, the return to these hard-working, honest (but destitute in many regards) people would be at least $1,000,000 annually from coal and lumber. This is not all. There lies in these mountain ranges, and near to this river, above these shoals, quantities of iron-ore, the extent not known; but should this approach in extent and quantity the coal found here, then this source of wealth will far exceed that of both coal and lumber. I venture the assertion that there is searcely anywhere any section of country of the same that there is scarcely anywhere any section of country of the same extent so rich in its natural resources; and here permit me to give an extract from the report of the engineer. He says:

I deem it unnecessary to expatiate more fully upon the character and quantity of the resources, mineral, manufacturing, and agricultural, of this section of the Cumberland River and the countries tributary thereto. Suffice it to say that there is perhaps no section of similar extent in the United States that can surpass it in undeveloped coal, iron, lumber, agricultural, and manufacturing resources.

Mr. Speaker, I am not asking for an appropriation simply to give some person a fat contract to do a piece of work which when done will yield no return to the people in the country; but, sir, I ask the sum because it is needed to develop the untold resources of that country; because by making these three great products—coal, iron, and lumber—accessible by transportation their consumers purchase them at lower rates; because it adds much to the general prosperity of the country, and consequently to the happiness of the people. Permit me to say that the people of that section are a patriotic, industrious, virtuous people, who are struggling under adverse circumstances to develop these great resources, thereby bringing slow profit to themselves and furnishing these great necessaries to others, and they ask the aid of the Government in opening up this great natural highway, and they should have it.

Sir, the district which I represent, through which the Cumberland River runs, and in which is situated these shoals, has never received from the Government a dollar for public improvement. The Government has built no court-house, no custom-house, no post-office; has cleaned out no rivers in its borders; and she pays annually in internal revenue alone into the Treasury over a half million dollars, which is more than some whole States pay, and to which the Government has appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars for objects of no more importance than this. That you may see how these appropriations have heretofore and are now being made, I desire to give you some of the appropriations in the last fifty years. The same are taken from the official records, and are no doubt correct. The whole amount appropriated to rivers and harbors in that time is about $50,000,000, and, the Secretary of War informs us, has been distributed as follows,

Maine	$1 300 000	Georgia	$571,000
New Hampshire		Florida	276, 000
Vermont		Alabama	639, 900
Massachusetts	2, 300, 000	Louisiana	1, 345, 000
Rhode Island	500,000	Texas	412,000
Connecticut	965, 000	Arkansas	385, 000
New York	7, 500, 000	Ohio	2, 046, 928
New Jersey	182,000	Indiana	629,000
Pennsylvania	1, 106, 000	Illinois	1, 659, 000
Delaware	2, 709, 759	Michigan	5, 900, 000
Maryland	1, 031, 500	Wisconsin	3, 732, 500
Virginia	738, 500	California	935, 000
North Carolina	1, 295, 900	Oregon	400,000
South Carolina	144, 000

The Mississippi River and its tributaries—the Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas—$15,200,000.

Some of the largest sums for harbor improvements are as follows:

East River, New York
Hudson River	1, 189, 288
Buffalo Harbor	1, 089, 494
Delaware Breakwater	2, 168, 403
Boston Harbor, Massachusetts	1, 115, 170
Cape Fear River, North Carolina	1,008,208
Savannah River and Harbor, Georgia	561, 000
Mobile Harbor and Bay	608, 997
Saint Mary's Falls and Canal, Michigan	1, 400, 000
Chicago Harbor	979, 000
Fox and Wisconsin Rivers	1, 245, 000
Des Moines Rapids, Mississippi River	4, 294, 200
Ohio River Falls and Louisville Canal	1, 163, 200
Rock Island Rapids, Mississippi River	1, 089, 650
Mouth of Mississippi River	2, 185, 181
mount of mississippi Mitchinian	2, 100, 101

Not one dollar has found its way into my district to improve this great natural highway. I do not intend to be understood as advocating what is commonly called a general system of internal improvement, such as giving aid to mere local objects not material, to giving aid as subsidies to private corporations or to individuals. I am opposed to all such aids, gifts, or grants, but I am in favor of giving such aid by improving the great water-lines and their tributaries as will facilitate the commerce of the country and develop its vast resources and wealth. This I believe is the true way to cheapen transportation.

I will not say that many, very many of the appropriations made to improve rivers, to build court-houses, custom-houses, and post-offices are wrong and unnecessary; but I will say they in most instances are extravagant. There is now in course of construction in the United States, outside of the District of Columbia, public buildings costing over $40,000,000, many of them costing double and even four times as much as they should, the unnecessary tinseling and carving on them costing more than I ask for this improvement. And if these unnecessary and useless expenditures were cut off, there would be enough saved to improve the Ohio River and all of its grand tributaries, thus opening up the untold wealth along their borders. Look for a moment at some of these appropriations, and at the almost incredible amount being expended on them: $7,500,000 for a post-office and court-house in New York; $4,000,000 for a custom-house in New orleans; $3,000,000 for a custom-house and post-office in Saint Louis; $2,500,000 for a mint in San Francisco; $2,500,000 for a custom-house in Chicago; $2,225,000 for a post-office in Boston, and hundreds of thousands of dollars to other buildings scattered all over the country, the cost of which is far in excess of what is required.

Mr. Speaker, the burdens of the Government and its protections and advantages are very unequally distributed. And I insist there can be provided some remedy, although the same may not be ample and complete. The policy should be to give back to those who contribute so much for the support of the Government something to aid in developing their natural resources when they are contiguous to the natural highways of the country. You thus stimulate the industries of the country, and render the people more contented and happy. But so long as you make the large useless appropriations, thereby in many instances building up rings and encouraging extravagance, you create heart-burnings and jealousies and stiffe the energies of those who, with proper help and encouragement, would make the country greater, more prosperous, and happy. This is a worthy object, and I ask and demand an appropriation to commence this work, not only in the name and behalf of my immediate constituency, but I ask it because this stream is of national importance and its improvement will help to develop the great natural resources of our common country

It may be said by some that we must retrench and reduce our enormous expenses. I will go as far as any man in this House to cut off all useless expenditures and exercise a rigid economy. Yet a large and enlightened statesmanship is ever looking to the growth and development of the nation, and whatever appropriation is necessary to carry out these objects and to make us happier and more prosperous should be made. Sometimes a small outlay yields twenty, thirty, and even a hundred fold. And believing, as I do, such will be the result of this improvement asked for, I say again, right, justice, and fairness demand that it shall be made.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to ask permission of the House, for the first time since I have been a member of it, to have printed in the RECORD some remarks which I have prepared on the currency question.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in view of the prostrate condition of the wealth-producing industries of the country, the pecuniary ruin of so great a proportion of our business men, and the threatened pecuniary ruin of thousands more, it is the paramount duty of Congress to investigate the cause that has produced so disastrons and distressing a condition of affairs, in order that we may astrons and distressing a condition of analys, in order that we may apply a proper remedy.

In entering upon this investigation, I am fully aware of the cause that divides the people and their representatives into parties on this momentous subject. Were it not for this cause of division, a remedy for the evils that afflict the business community could easily be discovered and speedily applied; one which the mass of our citizens would bear this expland.

Mr. Speaker, the difficulties that prevent us from speedily applying relief to the business, laboring, and wealth-producing industries of the country arise from the simple fact that there lies in our pathway a contest between two forms of government-a contest that is as old as the Constitution, for it took its rise in the convention of is as old as the Constitution, for it took its rise in the convention of 1787 that framed the Constitution—and until we come to a clear understanding of the difficulties that beset our pathway, that divide us into parties, and prevent us from united action, or any action at all, we will not be able to apply the remedies required to relieve the distress of the people, arising from a contraction of the circulating medium of the country, as I will clearly show.

The contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest and I was a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest and I was a contest about forms of government to which I refer is a contest and I was a contest and I test between the American system of State and Federal governments and the British aristocratic system, consolidating Scotland, Ireland, England, and Wales into one national government, based on aristocratic principles; therefore the effort with us to subordinate the State governments and consolidate their powers into a despotic national government, based on a moneyed aristocracy; which of all forms of government is the most odious

In this contest over forms of government, we find that the American system of full legal-tender money and the cash system of business best accord with the American system of government, while, on the other hand, the British system of bank currency and the credit system of business sustain the British system of aristocratic government. On the 19th of February, 1863, Hon. E. G. Spaulding, in this House, in his speech in favor of the national-bank currency bill, said:

It is now most apparent that the policy advocated by Alexander Hamilton of a strong central government was the true policy. (See page 4 of appendix to Spaulding's History of the Legal-Tender.)

In the general convention of 1787 that framed the Federal Constion the general convention of 1757 that framed the rederal Constitution the contest was between a national aristocratic form of government and a federal union of equal states, with "all power inherent in the people" of each state.

On this subject, on June 18, 1787, Mr. Hamilton said:

On this subject, on June 18, 1787, Mr. Hamilton said:

We must establish a general and national government, and annihilate the State distinctions and State operations; and unless we do this, no good purpose can be answered.

I foresee the difficulty on a consolidated plan of drawing a representation from so extensive a continent to one place. * * * This, however, can be no conclusive objection if it eventuates in an extinction of State governments. * * *

I believe the British government forms the best model the world ever produced, and such has been its progress in the minds of many, that this truth gradually gains ground. This government has for its object public strength and individual security. It is said with us to be unattainable. If it was once formed it would maintain itself. All communities divide themselves into the few and the many. The first are the rich and well born, the other the mass of the people. * * 4 Can a democratic assembly, who annually revolve in the mass of the people, be supposed steadily to pursue the public good? Nothing but a permanent body can check the imprudence of democracy. Their turbulent and uncontrolling disposition requires checks. * * * * check the imprudence of democracy. Their tarbuteneau tarbuteness are required checks. * * *

Let one body of the legislature be constituted during good behavior or life.

Let one executive be appointed [for life] who dares execute his powers. * * *

All State laws to be absolutely void which contravene the general laws. An officer to be appointed in each State to have a negative on all State laws. All the militia and the appointment of officers to be under the national government. * * *

The people are gradually ripening in their opinions of government; they begin to tire of an excess of democracy.—Yates's Debates of the Convention, pages 132-137.

Mr. Hamilton's proposed scheme of "national" government having Mr. Hamilton's proposed scheme of "national" government having been adopted in committee of the whole and reported to the convention, the federal union advocates, on June 20, 1787, moved to strike out the word "national in the first resolve" and to substitute the words "Government of the United States;" which was agreed to. The national system of Hamilton was abandoned, and the federal system was adopted.

Alexander Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, proposed to Congress the adoption of the British system of bank currency; and on his recommendation, on February 25, 1791, "The president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States" was incorporated for a period of twenty years, with a capital of $10,000,000.

Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, gave a written opinion denying the power of Congress to incorporate a bank of issue. Mr. Madison opposed it in a powerful speech in Congress as unconstitutional; and, although General Washington signed the bill, it is known that he was strongly opposed to bank currency based on specie for that he was strongly opposed to bank currency based on specie for redemption, or to any paper currency made redeemable in coin, even though it should be made a legal tender, as is fully shown by his letter to T. Stone, a member of the Maryland Legislature, written at Mount Vernon, February 27, 1787; and also by the action of the Virginia delegation in the constitutional convention of 1787, which, by a vote of nine States to two, refused to delegate the power to Congress to emit a "bill of credit," which is defined to be "a note promising payment in lawful money on demand and specially authorized by law to pass as a circulating medium." Virginia was one of the nine States which refused to delegate such a power to Congress

Mr. Madison appended a note to the proceedings of the convention in which he says that he "became satisfied that striking out the words 'to emit bills of credit' would not disable the Government from the use of public notes as far as they could be safe and proper, and would cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills [of credit] a tender either for public or private debts." A full legal tender is both money and currency, whereas a note, promising payment in lawful money, is mere currency and not money, and is made to depend for its value on the prompt performance of the promise to pay in lawful money on demand. .

The notes of the United States Bank, incorporated in 1791, were made legal-tenders to the Government and payable in legal-tender made legal-tenders to the Government and payable in legal-tender coin on demand, which made them "bills of credit," and therefore unconstitutional. The present national-bank currency, redeemable on demand in legal-tender greenbacks, are also legal-tenders for public dues, and are therefore mere currency or "bills of credit." As the advocates of national-bank currency have ever contended that the promissory notes of banks may be made a legal tender, of course it is both inconsistent and absurd for them to deny the constitutionality of a legal-tender Treasury note. Moreover, they are estopped by their own acts from setting up such a plea; and more especially in the face of a decision of the United States Supreme Court in favor of the constitutionality of United States Treasury notes issued in 1812 and 1814, which decision was delivered by Judge Story.

In order to show more clearly the want of any constitutional power in Congress to incorporate a bank or banks of issue, I call attention to the fact that in 1791, on a consideration of the bill to incorporate the "national" bank, Mr. Baldwin reminded Judge Wilson, of Pennsylvania, that the States refused to delegate to the Federal Govermment the power to create corporations. Particular power was then proposed to establish a national bank, which proposition was also rected. Judge Wilson admitted the correctness of the statement, which will be found to be correct by an examination of the proceedings of that convention.

In 1811 the national bank applied for a recharter, which was denied it by Congress, on which occasion Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, made a powerful speech against the recharter of the bank. In his remarks he treats such an institution as "unconstitutional, anti-American, and strictly a British institution." Mr. Clay, addressing himself to the advocates of bank currency, said:

Do they forget that we are not in Westminster Hall? * * * May not the time arrive when the concentration of such a vast portion of the circulating medium of the country in the hands of any corporation will be dangerous to the liberties of the country?

Mr. Speaker, that time has now arrived which Mr. Clay foresaw, and it becomes the duty of the representatives of the people to take from the national banks the power to make and control the currency. But lest we may fall into a still greater evil of returning to State banks of issue, I shall now show that the States are directly and positively prohibited from emitting a "bill of credit," and conse-quently of incorporating a bank of issue. Article 1, section 10 of the Federal Constitution says:

No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

Section 8, article 1, paragraph 5, of the Federal Constitution says: Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin.

The power to make money or a medium of exchange, which "is the tool of trade," is a power incident to sovereignty, and, as "all power is inherent in the people," they must be sovereign, as sovereignty is defined to be the highest power known to any government; and, as we cannot have two highest powers, sovereignty must reside in the people, and not in any constitution or form of government, but in those who make them and may at their pleasure change, alter, or amend them. Sovereignty delegates power to make supreme or the highest law, but cannot delegate any part of its sovereignty without losing the whole, as it cannot reside in the people and in their representatives at one and the same time. Therefore, in making constitutions and governments, it was proper that the people should have delegated either to Congress or to the State Legislatures the power to make money; and, having shown that this power has been delegated to Congress, it becomes necessary to show by what act of Congress this power is exercised. It is made by that act of Congress which makes anything a tender in payment of debts, which is called a legal-tender act. Two things are clearly observable in connection with this question: First, that the power to make a legal-tender act is not granted in the Federal Constitution by any mention of such an act; second, that the power to make such an act is contained in the power and duty to regulate the value of money.

Mr. Webster on this subject said:

Collating the grant to Congress and the prohibition to the States, a just reading of the provision is this: Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins, emit bills * * * or make anything besides gold and silver coin a legal-tender in payment of debts.

In reply to those who assert that coin only can be declared a legaltender, it is proper to call attention to the fact that the powers granted to Congress are permissive. and not obligatory; therefore, as Congress might not coin gold and silver, the States reserved the power to make gold and silver coin (of other countries) a tender in payment As the laws of Congress made in accordance with the powers granted to it are supreme, had Congress been compelled to make coin a tender in the payment of debts, dues, and demands, or the only legal tender, as the designing advocates of bank currency contend, the reservation on the part of the States would not have been made. It would have been both useless and absurd.

One other fact must be borne in mind in connection with this sub-ject, that in order to regulate the value of money Congress must make it a full legal tender, as a partial legal tender is always depreciated as compared with a full legal tender; as is proved in the case of silver coin, it, being a partial legal tender, is depreciated as compared with gold coin, which is the only full legal tender, and as was proven in the case of the demand notes issued in July, 1861, and Februser 1861. ruary, 1862. Those demand notes were only legal tenders for public dues. When the banks suspended specie payments in December, 1861, they refused to take them for debts due them, which depre-173, they refused to take them for debts due them, which depreciated those notes to a level with suspended-bank paper. On March 17, 1861, Congress made them an equal legal tender with gold coin, at a time when there was no coin to redeem them with, and when their redemption had been virtually prohibited by the act of February 25, 1862, when they instantly was to an equality in when their ruary 25, 1862, when they instantly rose to an equality in value with gold coin, and continued to rise with it to a value of $285.50 on the $100, as compared with partial legal-tender greenbacks. There are $60,000 of those full legal-tender notes not yet redeemed, and if there are any of them not yet destroyed by use they will now command the same premium as gold coin because by law they are made to perform the same functions. Consequently money is not only the creature of a legal-tender act, but that act also gives it value, whether composed of coin or paper. When money is made a full legal tender it is par of coin or paper. When money is made a full legal tender it is par or of equal value, and bears a premium or higher value than a partial legal tender as compared with a full legal tender. . Having shown that the entire power over the question of creating money is in Congress and by what act that power is exercised, and that Congress cannot justly make a partial legal tender, it is proper to call attention to the fact that Congress cannot demonetize coin, as the States may make it a legal tender in case Congress fails or refuses to do so.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF MONEY, AND ITS SUPERIORITY OVER BANK CURRENCY.

By an examination of Jefferson's published correspondence, the following will be found in a letter to his son-in-law, Colonel Eppes, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in Congress, dated June 24, 1813. He said:

chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in Congress, dated June 24, 1813. He said:

In the war of 1755 our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper currency bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, witdows, farmers, &c.

We then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax but bearing no interest. These were received, and never depreciated a single farthing.

In the revolutionary war the old Congress and the States issued bills without interest and without tax. They occupied the channels of circulation very freely until those channels were overflowed by an excess beyond all the calls of circulation. But, although we have so improvidently suffered the field of circulating medium to be filched from us by private individuals, yet I think we may recover it in part, and even in the whole if the States will co-operate with us.

If Treasury bills are emitted, on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of 6 per cent, there is no one who would not take them in preference to bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest, and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hands to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever their credit faltered, open public loans, on which these bills alone should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation, so as to maintain them on an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from the possession of circulation. * * *

But it will be asked, Are we to have no banks? Are merchants and others to be depri

In October, 1873, the Westminster Review published the following showing the foresight of Jefferson in his allusion to the ruinous British system of bank currency:

THE MINT AND THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

In breaking this monopoly of the bank we should be taking great strides toward the attainment of that ideal system of currency which Sir Robert Peel must have had in his heart when he passed his curreacy laws; a system under which the state shall be the sole fountain of issue; under which no money shall circulate on credit, or, if it does, shall circulate on the credit of the state, all bank notes as well as coins bearing the image and superscription of the head of the state, and under which all profits upon the issue of money shall form part of the imperial revenue. * * The power of issue now exercised by the Bank of England and by the English, Irish, and Scotch banks (all private corporations) is a relic of feudalism. * * * The manufacture of coin has been suppressed long ago, but the manufacture of paper money still remains, and the profits of this manufacture are allowed to remain in private hands, the state taking upon itself the manufacture of the only part of the currency upon which there is or can be a loss. It is high time this state of things cease; that all rights of issue were gathered into the hands of the state; that the debt of the Bank of England was paid off; that all notes but those of the state were suppressed; that the powers of issue now exercised by the banks were vested in the royal mint, * * and that the profits upon paper currency were claimed by the state and appropriated * * * to the reduction of texation.

In England there is now going on an active controversy and demand

In England there is now going on an active controversy and demand for the total abolishment of the British system of bank currency and the substitution of government legal-tender paper for such issues.

The following quotations from Franklin not only sustain Jefferson's view in relation to full legal-tender Treasury notes, convertible into bonds or certificates of indebtedness, but they prove the superiority of the money of the colonies of Virginia and Pennsylvania previous to the Revolution of 1776, over a redeemable currency. Full legal-tender money, not redeemable in coin or other money, is always as the American system of more.

par, known as the American system of money.

Franklin, in a letter to Samuel Cooper, of April 22, 1779, (the Works of Benjamin Franklin, volume 3, page 328, by Jared Sparks,)

Secondly, after the first emission [of bills or continental money] I proposed that we should stop, strike no more, but borrow on interest those we had issued. This was not then approved of, and more bills were issued.

This shows that Franklin as well as Jefferson understood the importance of allowing United States Treasury notes to be bonded at the pleasure of the holder; and, although the "old Congress" could not lay any taxes, either directly or indirectly, and had no revenue but what was derived from a requisition on the States, had Franklin's proposition been adopted, the continental money would have remained

Benjamin Franklin, in 1769, before the British board of trade, defended the American colonial system of legal-tender paper money, in opposition to the British system of bank currency or "bills of credit." It was said-

* * that paper money carries the gold and silver out of the provinces, and so ruins the country, as experience has shown in every colony where it has been practiced to any degree.

To which Franklin replied, as follows:

To which Franklin replied, as follows:

This opinion of its ruining the country seems to be merely speculative, or not otherwise founded than upon misinformation in the matter of fact. The truth is that, the balance of trade with Britain being greatly against them, the gold and silver are drawn out to pay the balance; and then the necessity of some medium of trade has induced the making of paper money. Thus, if carrying out all the gold and silver ruins a country, every colony was ruined before it made paper money. But, far from being ruined by it, the colonies that have made use of paper money have been, and are, all in a thriving condition.

Pennsylvania, before it made any paper money, was totally stripped of its gold and silver, though they had from time to time, like the neighboring colonies, agreed to take gold and silver coins at higher nominal values, in hopes of drawing money into and retaining it for the internal uses of the province. During that weak practice silver got up by degrees to eight shillings and ninepence per ounce.

* long before paper money was made. But this practice of increasing the denomination was found not to answer the people. The balance of trade carried out the gold and silver coins as fast as they were brought in, the merchants raising the price of their goods in proportion to the increased denomination of the money. The difficulties for want of cash were accordingly very great, the chief part of the trade being carried on by the extremely inconvenient method of barter, when, in 1723, paper money was first made there, [in Pennsylvania,] which gave new life to business, promoted greatly the settlement of new lands, (by lending small sums to beginners, on easy interest, to be paid by installments, whereby the province has so greatly increased in inhabitants that the export from thence thither is now more than tenfold what it then was:

* * * so that it does not appear to be of the ruinous nature ascribed to it.

The British board of trade then said:

That every medium of trade should have an intrinsic value, which paper money has not.

To which Franklin replied as follows:

To which Franklin replied as follows:

However fit a particular thing may be for a particular purpose, whenever that, thing is not to be had, or not to be had in sufficient quantity, [and must be given up to the demands of commerce whenever made,] it becomes necessary to use something else, the fittest that can be got in lieu of it.

It seems hard, therefore, to draw all their real money from them, and then refuse them the poor privilege of using paper instead of its bank bills and banker's notes as are daily used here [in England] as a medium of trade, and in large dealings, perhaps the greater part is transacted by their means, and yet they have no intrinsic value, but rest on the credit of those that issued them, as paper bills in the colonies do on the credit of the respective governments there. Their [bank bills] being payable in cash upon sight by the drawer is, indeed, a circumstance that cannot attend the colony bills, for the reason just above mentioned, their cash [bullion] being drawn from them by the British trade; but the legal-tender being substituted ints place is rather a greater advantage to the possessor, since he need not be at the trouble of going to a particular bank or banker to demand the money.

At this very time even the silver money in England is obliged to the legal-tender for a part of its value; that part which is the difference between its real weight and denomination. Great part of the shillings and sixpences now current are, by wearing, become 5, 10, 20, and some of the sixpences even 50 per cent. too light. For this difference between the real and nominal you have no intrinsic value; you have not so much as paper; you have nothing. It is the legal tender, with the knowledge that it can easily be repassed for the same value, that makes three pennyworth of silver pass for sixpence.

Gold and silver are not intrinsically of equal value with iron, a metal in itself capable of many more benefits to mankind. Their value rests chiefly in the estimation they happen to be in among th

Gonge, in his History of Paper Money and Banking, in part 2, chapter 2, page 8, in support of Franklin's defense of the Pennsylvania system of legal-tender paper money, says:

system of legal-tender paper money, says:

Governor Pownall, in his work on the Administration of the Colonies, bestows high praise on the paper system of Pennsylvania. "I will venture to say that there never was a wiser or better measure; never one better calculated to serve the interests of an increasing country; that there never was a measure more steadily pursued, or more faithfully executed, for forty years together, than the loan office in Pennsylvania, founded and administered by the assembly of that province." Dr. Franklin also bestowed high commendation on the system: And Adam Smith, apparently guided by Governor Pownall and Dr. Franklin, says: "Pennsylvania was always more moderate in its emission of paper money than any of our other colonies. Its paper currency accordingly is said never to have sunk below the value of gold and silver which was current in the colony before the first emission of its paper money."

The par value of the legal-tender paper money of Pennsylvania and Virginia was not because either colony was more moderate in its issues, as Adam Smith assumes, but because it was not redeemable in other money, and therefore it did not depend for its value in a prompt performance of a promise to redeem it in coin, which the colonies did not have and could not obtain. This is a useful lesson which mere theorists or writers on political economy are slow to learn. In 1797, when the British government declared war against France, the Bank of England suspended specie payments and remained in a state of suspension until 1821, a period of nearly a quarter of a century. The suspension was legalized by act of Parliament, and the notes of the Bank of England were made a legal tender to the Government, and individuals were prohibited from collecting debts by legal process unless they would take these bank-notes in payment. With these irredeemable bank-notes the trade and industries of England were maintained in an active and prosperous condition dur-ing the wars on the Continent. England doubled its wealth, business was carried on more nearly on a cash basis, there being a constant and steadily increasing volume of money "equal to the wants of trade" and industry in that country. Not having any contraction, there was no commercial crash or money panic until 1819, when an act was no commercial crash or money panic until 1819, when an act was passed for a resumption of specie payments or a return to a redeemable currency in 1823, in anticipation of which act and to prepare for a return to the old system the banks began to curtail discounts, in order to contract their currency-producing riots in 1819, and general ruin to the business interests in 1825, when the great money panic took place in that country, in consequence of a fearful contraction of the circulating medium. Thomas Doubleday, in A Financial, Monetary, and Statistical History of England, says that "prices declined one-half in six months" in 1819. Contraction caused this panic, and an expansion of the circulating medium instantly relieved it. Thrice since the resumption act of 1819 the Bank of England would have been compelled to suspend specie payments, under a specie-basis system, but for a suspension of the law, which enabled the bank to expand the currency and relieve the demands for more currency. Coin being limited in amount, a currency based on it for redemption must be limited in volume by the basis; it being insufficient in volume, the credit system of doing business is forced on the country. in volume, the credit system of doing business is forced on the country. Periodically the credit system becomes blown up to the bursting point, when a commercial crash and money panic ensue, to the ruin of business men and the advantage of credit-mongers or note-shavers, and those who have a money capital. In 1822 there were 160,000 property-holders in England; to-day there are less than 30,000. Such are the ruinous effects in England of bank currency based on specie for redemotion.

From 1862 to 1866 we had a legal-tender circulation not redeemable in coin, and therefore limited only by the necessities of the Federal Government and the wants of trade. During that time the country nearly doubled its wealth, business was carried on with cash payments; business men in 1866 were "out of debt and out of danger." But, as there were but few notes to shave, money-lenders were desirous of again forcing the business of the country to be carried on under the credit exist. under the credit system. To accomplish this purpose, an act was passed on April 12, 1866, to fund United States Treasury notes, which was carried on until over $1,200,000,000 of United States Treasury notes and certificates of indebtedness and deposit had been funded up to 1873, when the commercial crash and money panic of that year took place in consequence of this stealthy contraction by funding. William Pitt, in reference to Alexander Hamilton's funding system in 1789 to aid as a basis for his bank currency in 1791, said:

Let the Americans adopt their funding system and go into their banking institu-tions, and their boasted independence will be a mere phantom.

These facts fully prove the advantage of legal-tender money over bank currency requiring redemption in legal-tender money. They also show the superiority of the cash system of business over the credit system, which latter makes business men the slaves of creditmongers, note-shavers, and money-lenders generally.

Having shown the desperate character of the contest now going on between two systems of government, and that the bank currency and credit system of business largely enter into this contest, and hence the desperate efforts on the part of those aiming to establish a mon-eyed aristocracy in this country to force us to retain banks of issue and the credit system of business to aid them in the accomplishment of their purpose, I will now refer to the history of United States Treasury notes from 1812 to this time.

THE ISSUE OF UNITED STATES TREASURY NOTES.

On July 12, 1812, February 25, 1813, March 4 and December 26, 1814, Congress authorized United States Treasury notes to be issued, which were legal tenders to the Federal Government and convertible into the stocks or bonds of the Government. This was done under the administration of Mr. Madison, and by the advice of Jefferson.

The constitutionality of these legal-tender convertible notes was tested in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Thorndike vs. The United States. The following opinion of the court was delivered by Judge Story:

By the statutes of the United States, under which the Treasury notes have been issued, it is enacted that such notes shall be receivable in payment to the United States for duties, taxes, and sales of public lands to the full amount of the principal and interest accruing due on such notes. It follows of course that they are a legal tender in payment of debts of this nature due to the United States, and by the very terms of the acts public officers are bound to receive them. (2 Mason, 1-18.)

In the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, Chief Justice Marshall said: When the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground.

In 1815 Congress again authorized an issue of $20,000,000 of legal-tender convertible Treasury notes.

General Jackson, in his first message to Congress, in December, 1829, in reference to the "national" bank, said:

Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised which would avoid all constitutional difficulties and at the same time secure all advantages to the Government and country that were expected to result from the present bank.

In 1832 General Jackson vetoed a recharter of the national bank, and was triumphantly sustained by the anti-bank-currency democrats and whigs. Then, as now, many persons who assumed to be leaders in the democratic ranks supported bank currency and denounced Jackson and the veto. Jackson and his supporters repudiated and drove them into the ranks of the bank-currency party.

General Jackson, in his farewell address, said:

But experience has now proved the mischiefs and dangers of a paper currency, (bank currency,) and it rests with you to determine whether the proper remedy shall be applied. * * *

The corporations which create the paper money cannot be relied upon to keep the circulating medium uniform in amount. * * *

Recent events have proved that the money system (banks of issue) of this country may be used as an engine to undermine your free institutions; and that those who desire to engross all power in the hands of the few, and to govern by fraud or force, are aware of its power, and prepared to employ it. Your banks now furnish your only circulating medium, and money is plenty or scarce according to the quantity of notes issued by them. * * * When the charter for the Bank of the United States was obtained from Congress it perfected the scheme of the paper system, and gave to its advocates the position they have struggled to obtain from the commencement of the Federal Government down to the present hour. * * * The distress and sufferings inflicted on the people by the bank are some of the fruits of that system of policy which is continually striving to enlarge the authority of the Federal Government beyond the limits fixed for it by the Constitution. The powers enumerated in that instrument do not confer on Congress the right to establish such a corporation as the Bank of the United States. * * * It behooves you, therefore, to be watchful in your States as well as in the Federal Government. The power which the moneyed interest can exercise when concentrated under a single head, and with our present system of currency, was sufficiently demonstrated in the struggle made by the Bank of the United States. * * * The paper-money system (of banks of issue) and its natural associates, monopoly and exclusive privileges, have already struck their roots deep in the soil, and it will require all your efforts to check its further growth and to eradicate the evil. * * * But it will require steady and persevering exertions on your part to rid your-selves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform on this subject, that you must not hope the conflict will be a short one nor success easy.

In 1837 the credit system became extended to the busting point; bank currency was contracted as usual at such times, producing a commercial crash and money panic; specie payments were suspended by the banks, they locked their doors and bade defiance to the peo-ple. Mr. Van Buren called a special session of Congress, to meet in September, 1837. In his message he advised a separation between the United States Treasury and the banks. The adoption of the independent Treasury system—composed of gold, silver, and Treasury notes—was recommended. John C. Calhoun, in speaking of this system and in favor of an issue of Treasury notes on the 19th of September, said:

It is, then, my impression that in the present condition of the world a paper currency, in some form * * * is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. * * * actions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. * *

It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her; it was also made a legal tender, but which of course, was not obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount, say between four and five hundred thousand dollars, remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum.

No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank; more reliable, more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands, while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profit; to increase which they extend their business to the most dangerous extremes. And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit blended with that of the bank, when the superior credit of the Government credit blended with that of the bank, when the superior credit of the Government credit of the Government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity. * * *

On October 3 Mr. Calhoun said:

On October 3 Mr. Calhoun said:

We are told, the form I suggested is but a repetition of the "old continental money;" a ghost that is ever conjured up by all who wish to give the banks an exclusive monopoly of Government credit. The assertion is not true; there is not the least analogy between them. The one was a promise to pay when there was no revenue, and the other a promise to receive in the dues of the Government when there is abundant revenue.

We are told that there is no instance of a government paper that did not depreciate. In reply, I affirm that there is none, assuming the form I propose, that ever did depreciate. Unenever apaper, receivable in dues of Government, had anything like a fair trial, it has succeeded. Instance the case of North Carolina, referred to in my opening remarks. The drafts of the Treasury, at this moment, with all their incumbrance, are nearly at par with gold and silver. * * * The case of Russia might also be mentioned. In 1827 she had a fixed paper circulation in the form of bank-notes, but which were inconvertible, of upward of $120,003,000, estimated in the metallic ruble, and which had for years remained without fluctuation, having nothing to sustain it, but that it was received in the dues of the Government, and that too with a revenue of only about $90,000,000 annually. I speak on the authority of a respectable traveler. Other instances, no doubt, might be added, but it needs no such support.

It has another and striking advantage over bank circulation, in its superior cheapness, as well as greater stability and safety. Bank paper is cheap to those who make it; but dear, very dear, to those who use it, fully as much as gold and silver. It is the little cost of its manufacture, and the dear rates at which it is furnished to the community, which gives the great profit to those who have a monopoly of the article. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the profit by the splendid plaaces which we see under the name of banking-houses, and the vast fortunes which have been ac

Mr. Calhoun, in his speech on the independent Treasury bill, March 22, 1838, said:

I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered—what heretofore I have but suggested—that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive in all dues, leaving its creditors to take it, or gold and silver, at their option, would, to the extent to which it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves, ment; that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I will be able to do more—to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution; and that those at least who think that Congress can authorize the notes of private corporations to be received in the public dues are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper.

On July 4, 1840, the independent Treasury act was signed by the President and became a law, establishing such a system as General Jackson recommended to Congress in 1829.

The crash and panic of 1837 were of long continuance, the business of the country was stagnated, and so continued until 1840. The peoof the country was stagnated, and so continued until 1840. The people, not knowing that it was caused by bank-currency expansion and contraction, held the democratic administration responsible for the prostrate condition of the industries of the country, and defeated Mr. Van Buren, and brought into power the very party of men who had produced the distress of the people. Among the first acts of those men was to repeal the independent Treasury system, with the view of again incorporating a national bank, which purpose they failed to accomplish by President Tyler's veto.

In 1845 the democratic party was restored to power, and in 1846 Congress re-enacted the independent Treasury system, of which the legal-tender convertible Treasury note formed a part. In 1846, 1847, 1857, and 1860 Congress authorized the issues of Treasury notes, legaltenders and convertible. And here the record of the democratic party on this important subject closes, December, 1860. We find that the democratic party has uniformly opposed banks of issue; that from 1812 to 1860 it issued United States Treasury notes; that it never issued a redeemable Treasury note, but uniformly made them constitutions. vertible into the stocks or bonds of the Federal Government; that in 1832 General Jackson denied that any man was or could be a demo-crat who was in favor of the national bank, and drove the advocates of bank currency into the ranks of the national-bank party.

Banks of issue being created by a special law, granting special privileges to a special class, are therefore based on aristocratic or anti-democratic and anti-republican principles, and as no man can be both a democrat or a republican and an aristocrat at one and the same time, and as men are known by their practices rather than by their professions, no genuine democrat or republican can desire to avoid meeting an issue on this momentous question.

FACTS IN RELATION TO THE CREATION OF "GREENBACKS" AND THE NATIONAL-BANK ACT.

Secretary Chase, in December, 1861, advised Congress to pass a national-bank act. Mr. Spaulding, in his "history" of the "greenback," informs us that bankers were the advisers of Mr. Chase.

Mr. Spaulding was on the Subcommittee of Ways and Means, and knowing that national banks could not be organized until a bonded indebtedness could be created, and that the speediest means of creating such a debt and of obtaining the means of carrying on the war, he informs us that on his own responsibility, on December 30, 1861, he introduced his bill to authorize an issue of full legal-tender United States notes, "payable generally without specifying any place or time of payment," and convertible into a bond at the pleasure of the holder.

Mr. Spaulding informs us that the bankers of the various eastern cities, when his bill was reported, appeared in Washington in opposition to it. Having control of Secretary Chase, they appointed a meeting at the Treasury, and sent for the committees of the Senate and House to meet them there on Saturday, January 11, 1862; which they did. The bankers proposed that United States notes should not be received for custom-house duties, and also required a suspension of the independent Treasury act, which prevented the public moneys from being de-posited in banks; they further insisted on the Secretary of the Treasproposed that the Secretary of the Treasury should be permitted to pawn bonds for loans, which, if not paid at maturity, were to be sold at any price that could be obtained for them.

We are informed that the House committee rejected the proposi-tions of the bankers and left them and the Secretary in conference; which resulted in an agreement between the bankers and the Secretary that Congress should not issue Treasury notes, but should immediately pass a national-bank act. The Committee of Ways and Means also rejected this proposition, and amended Mr. Spaulding's bill of December 30, 1861, authorizing an issue of full legal-tender convertible United States notes and bonds, redeemable in twenty years, which was reported to the House on January 22, 1862; the bill passed the House on February 6, 1862. It authorized an issue of $100,000,000 of full legal-tender United States notes, not "bills of credit," but convertible into bonds at the pleasure of the holder; it also authorized an issue of $500,000,000 of bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest, principal and interest payable in full legal-tender United States notes. The act provided that such notes should be "received the same as coin in payment for any loans that should hereafter be sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. Fessenden, when he reported the House bill to the Senate on February 16, 1862, as amended by the committee, in his remarks very clearly insinuated that the main purpose was to perpetuate the bonded indebtedness and pay the interest in coin.

The bill was opposed in the Senate because the Treasury notes were made convertible and not redeemable in coin on demand. In reply to this objection Senator Howe said:

All paper currencies have been and ever will be irredeemable. It is a pleasant fiction to call them redeemable; it is an agreeable fancy to think them so. I would not dispel that fancy—I would not oppose that fiction—only that the great emergency that is upon us seems to me to render it more than usually proper that the nation should begin to speak truth to itself, to have done with shams, and deal with realities.

On February 19, the House proceeded to a consideration of the bill as amended by the Senate. By a reference to the Globe of that date it will be seen that Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Spaulding denounced the Senate amendments as dictated by the eastern bankers and money-lenders, in severe terms. Mr. Stevens said:

I have a melancholy foreboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly-devised scheme which will carry great injury and great loss to all classes of the people throughout this Union except one.

No one knew better than the author of the act to place a premium on gold coin, that it was a gross act of injustice to the people, and that what Mr. Stevens feared, they designed to accomplish by their "cunningly-devised scheme."

The House bill as amended by the Senate was referred to a committee of conference, and, as it came from their hands and was adopted by Congress, it authorized an issue of one hundred and fifty millions of United States notes payable at the Treasury, without saying how or when, and covertible into a 5.20 bond at the pleasure of the holder, and the act of February 25, 1862, required that this note should have printed on it the following:

This note is a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and is exchangeable for United States 6 per cent. bonds redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after five

I have carefully examined the acts of Congress which authorized issues of United States notes, commonly known as "greenbacks," and assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that no such note by any of those acts was made payable in coin or other legal-tender money, but were made convertible into bonds at the pleasure of the holder, until the passage of the national-bank act in March, 1863, when that provision of the legal-tender act was repudiated by depriving the holder of those notes of the right to bond them at his pleasure after July 1, 1863. Perhaps the following remarks of Mr. Spaulding on that subject may throw some light on it. The bond had to be created before the national banks could go into operation: On Monday, January 12, 1863, Mr. Spaulding said:

The Secretary has paid out nearly $25,000,000 of legal-tender notes, being all that he was authorized to issue; and, notwithstanding he has had authority for the last ten months to sell $500,000,000 of 5.20 6 per cent. bonds at the market price, he has only disposed of about $25,000,000, and he has still authority to sell $475,000,000 at the market price, and take his pay for them in legal-tender notes.

One of the reasons why more of these bonds have not been disposed of is that there has been no redundancy [no surplus] of the currency, and it has been difficult for the Secretary to get legal-tender notes on a sale of the bonds and 7.30 notes that he has already negotiated.

Gold coin, being the only full legal tender, makes a greater demand for it, causing it to command a premium. The moment greenbacks and silver coin are made equal legal-tenders with gold coin, they will be equal to each other—as money—or par. This would close the gold-gambling rooms and give the people par money. It would also give to real estate and all productions of labor and industry real values, which would decrease the cost of living and of doing business equal to the premium on coin or the comparative depreciation on silver coin and "greenbacks," thus increasing the net profits of labor and of the business or wealth-producing capitalists without doing any injustice to the speculative capitalists and bondholders, as their par money would have

This "cunningly-devised scheme" of making the interest on bonds payable in gold coin at 6 per cent. interest per annum, with exemption from State and local taxation, equal to from 2 to 8 per cent. more, and by making gold coin the only full legal tender or the only legal tender for custom-house duties, has designedly and unjustly cost the people incalculable millions of dollars. If there are Representatives in this House who are disposed to doubt or deny this fact or doubt that greenbacks and gold coin can be par, we propose that gold and silver coins and greenbacks be made equal legal tenders; and, if they do not circulate side by side of par or equal value, as money, readily exchangeable with each other, obviating any and all necessity for "bills of credit, or mere currency requiring redemption in money, and consequently obviating the necessity of locking up coin or greenbacks as a basis of credit for a redeemable currency, we will cheerfully abandon our propositions and submit to the present evils without a murmur, and absolve those who made a premium on coin of any and all design to plunder the laborer, the wealth-producing capitalists, and general business men, to advance the interest of speculative or non-wealth-producing capitalists. We ask a fair trial for our propositions, and are not afraid of the result. Dare those who oppose and denounce us risk the test proposed? If so, let it be done promptly, that the industrial interests of our country may be relieved and rescued from total ruin.

Early in the session of 1863 Congress incorporated the useless, costly, and dangerous national-bank system of currency. Mr. Spaulding, then in Congress and now president of a national bank at Buffalo, New York, on page 167 of his History of the Legal-Tender, in speaking of the nine-hundred-million-loan act considered in Committee of the Whole House on Monday, January 12, 1863, says:

The bill as reported did not contain some provisions which Secretary Chase was very anxious to have passed; one was to repeal the provision restricting him in the sale of bonds to the market value, another was to abrogate [repudiate] that most equitable and just provision contained in the original legal-tender act [of February 25, 1862] allowing the holders of legal-tender notes to convert them at any time into 5.20 6 per cent. bonds, interest payable semi-annually in coin. The committee did not deem it just to abrogate this provision, while Secretary Chase believed its repeal would enable him to make better terms in selling bonds.

We are told that the Secretary of the Treasury desired to obtain better terms for bonds; but we have never been informed that he did obtain better terms for them; while we do know that by this cunningly-devised legislation they were obtained at less than forty cents on the dollar.

On page 169 of Mr. Spaulding's history, containing his speech on the nine-hundred-million-loan act, he said: "That as there was then (January, 1863) no excess of money or circulating medium the Secretary of the Treasury had not been able to dispose of more than twenty-five millions of the five hundred millions of bonds which the legal-tender act of February 25, 1862, authorized him to dispose of." This is a very important fact in the consideration of this remarkable subject of creating a bonded indebtedness to enable bankers to get national-bank currency to put in operation those institutions which Congress, at the repeated urgent request of Secretary Chase, incorporated in March, 1833; at this same session of Congress which "repudiated" that "most equitable and just" contract with the people allowing them to bond United States Treasury notes at their pleasure; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] who participated in this injunities legislation affects to shed "grangelia tenes" on the flear and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blanks] who participated in this iniquitous legislation affects to shed "crocodile tears" on the floor of this House and to be "ashamed" of such legislation as increased the premium on coin and comparatively lowered the value of the legal-tender greenback, repudiated by its maker for custom-house duties and interest on bonds.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Maine can impose on the rep-Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Maine can impose on the representatives of the people on this floor, it would be too absurd to suppose that he can delude our constituents or make them believe that he now desires to make legal-tender Treasury notes or greenbacks of equal or par value with gold coin, while he opposes the passage of an act of Congress to honor the notes of the Government by making them receivable for all debts due to-the maker of it, as well as receivable by the citizens of the country for private debts. Those of us who make our living by hard work and diligent attention to business, and are extensively engaged in trade, know that when we put out our are extensively engaged in trade, know that, when we put out our notes and refuse to take them for all debts due us at their face value on presentation, we have dishonored our paper and thereby depreciated it, and lost our credit and standing in the business community and acted with bad faith toward the public. The same rule applicable to business men equally applies to conducting the business of a great government. No man or government can make their credit good or maintain a good standing in business circles if they deliberately dishonor their own paper; consequently, if it is desirable to maintain the good faith of this Government, and to make its silver coin and paper money par or equal to gold coin, they must be honored by the Government, by making them legal-tenders for all dues to the maker of them, as well as to individuals for private debts. The advocates of contraction to perpetuate a useless system of bank currency, and keep money and currency out of the hands of the people, may by such a system starve laborers and drive business men to ruin and a slavish submission to measures necessary to maintain an aristocracy in this country, but it will never make silver and Treasury notes par with a full legal tender. It may support an aristocracy, but it will impoverish the country and starve the people. Such are the ruinous effects of the contraction and bank-currency measures advocated by the gentleman from Maine and those who are opposed to us; and in the face of these facts we are at a loss to see how any man claiming to be a genuine democrat or republican can uphold such aristocratic and ruinous propositions or hesitate for a moment to exercise their great power in this House by applying the remedies necessary, not only to maintain the credit and good faith of the Govment, but to relieve a distressed and ruined people. I have been sent here to represent an earnest people, who demand par money; no cur-rency, requiring "specie basis" and redemption, and the enactment of measures to reduce taxation, and to revive, make active, and maintain the labor and wealth-producing industries of our country. I am resolved that, if no measures to relieve the people are passed by this House, the responsibility of such a crime shall not rest on me. A powerful moneyed interest may combine the eastern press against us; they may employ adherents to denounce us for daring to oppose their selfish and heartless schemes; knowing, as I do by a long and exten-sive experience in business, that our propositions are correct and would promote the public good and the honor of our country, I shall not aban-

Having referred to the fact that greenbacks are not payable or redeemable in other money, that no act creating them can be produced that makes them payable at any time in coin or other money, and as the people, after July 1, 1863, were deprived of the right to convert them into bonds, and as the gentleman from Maine has informed us that he is ashamed of the act that increased the premium on the bondholders' coin and comparatively lowered the value of the people's greenback, let us see whether we cannot discover the design of passing so ruinously unjust an act of bad faith toward the people.

Mr. Spaulding, on page 198 of his history, says: "The attempt of Secretary Chase to float 5 per cent. 10.40 bonds" caused the premium on gold coin to rise as follows: January 15, 1864, gold was 155; on the 15th of April it was 178; June 15 it was 197; on June 29 it was from 235 to 250, which enabled 40 cents in gold coin to obtain $1 in green-backs, which consequently enabled 40 cents in coin to obtain a dollar's backs, which consequently enabled 40 cents in coin to obtain a dollar's worth of bonds to draw interest on and deposit in the Treasury, and obtain 90 per cent. of the face value of the bond in national-bank currency, on which additional interest is paid the bondholder by the individual borrower of that currency, making to the bondholder and banker three rates of interest on each dollar of bonds which cost him from thirty-five to forty cents on the dollar. Therefore the gentleman from Maine has just cause to be "ashamed" of the acts of his party while exercising unlimited power in this House over legislation. But worse follows: On July 11, 1864, the premium on gold advanced to 285½ at the board of brokers in New York, making 35 cents in gold coin equal to $1 in legally-dishonored greenbacks, which enabled the 35 cents in gold coin to obtain a dollar's worth of bonds. No such deliberate robbery of any people by cunningly-devised legislation can be found in any other country on the face of the globe, nor do we think that any other than the law-abiding people of this country would so long and so patiently have endured it.

Mr. Chairman, this is a question between an oppressed people and their oppressors; between the doers of wrong and the sufferers of their oppressors; between the doers of wrong and the sufferers of wrong; and our oppressors and their supple tools say we are lunatics for objecting any longer to endure such monstrous wrongs, well cal-culated to drive a once free and prosperous people into worse than lunacy.

Hear Secretary Fessenden on this subject, in his report of December, 1864. He said:

In the course of a few days the price of this article (gold coin) rose from $1.50 to $2.85 in paper for $1 in specie, and subsequently fell, in as short a period, to $1.87, and then again rose as rapidly to $2.50; and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculators, and probably of secret enemies, to raise the price of coin, regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country or desiring to inflict it.

Doubtless Ex-Senator Fessenden felt surprised, confounded, and indignant that "speculators" or "secret enemies" should have taken advantage of his own act, and that of his party, to obtain a dollar's worth of Federal bonds for thirty-five cents in gold coin, when that very act was dictated by those "speculators" and "secret enemies" of the people's rights and interests.

In disregard of those bankers and brokers, that able, firm, and determined man, Thaddeus Stevens, had procured the passage of the legal-tender act in the House making the "greenback" a full legal-tender equally with gold coin; and had Secretary Fessenden, then a Senator and chairman of the Finance Committee, not permitted himself to have been led by bankers and brokers in opposition to the self to have been led by bankers and brokers in opposition to the public good, no such event could have arisen, our bonds would have brought more than thirty-five cents on the dollar in gold coin, and we would now have vastly less of interest-bearing debt to oppress the industries of our country. Congress by adopting our measures can put a stop to gold-gambling, prevent any more operations of that kind, and begin to protect the rights of our constituents, and our own rights and interests as well. and interests as well.

The national-bank act was approved March 25, 1863, more than a year after it was proven by the act of March 17, 1862, that full legaltender Treasury notes not redeemable in coin were equal in value to gold coin.

Mr. Spaulding, on pages 187 and 188 of his history, says:

No national-bank currency was issued until about the 1st of January, 1864. After that time it was gradually issued. On the 1st of July, 1864, the sum of $25,000,000 had been issued; and on the 22d April, 1865, shortly after the surrender of General Lee, the whole amount of national-bank circulation issued to that time was only $146,927,975. It will therefore be seen that comparatively little direct aid was realized from this currency until after the close of the war. * * * * This bank issue was in fact an additional inflation of the currency.

It is not only an inflated but a fictitious currency. A currency is inflated when its volume exceeds its basis of redemption; it is redeemable in greenbacks, and the volume of it vastly exceeds its redeeming basis of greenbacks, and the national banks cannot redeem their curbasis of greenbacks, and the national banks cannot redeem their currency in greenbacks, much less in coin; therefore the absurdity of talking about redeeming bank currency in coin; and as one full legal-tender has been shown to be equal in value to another, irrespective of the commodity or material of which it is made, by making the greenback a full legal tender it will be equal to gold coin, and thus produce immediate specie circulation, obviating any necessity of contraction to make the national-bank money redeemable in gold coin, and obviate all necessity of usurping the power to make the greenback a "bill of credit" or redeemable in violation of our obligations to support the Constitution and in disregard of the public good.

By the passage of the "nine-hundred-million-loan act" in May and June, 1864, the circulating medium was sufficiently expanded to induce the people to take the bonds which the Secretary of the Treasury employed agents at great expense to sell; and whatever may have been the purpose or motive of Congress in repudiating the convertibility of the "greenback" into a bond, I have clearly shown that gold-gamblers were enabled to increase the premium on gold coin as the only full legal tender, and comparatively depreciated the greenback, enabling speculative capitalists to get the bonds for thirty-five and forty cents on the dollar.

THE REASON GIVEN BY CONGRESS IN 1865 FOR CONTRACTION.

Secretary McCulloch, although he admits in his report of 1865 that the business of the country was mainly done with cash payments, that the business men were out of debt, and that the country was in a remarkably prosperous condition, advised Congress to contract the circulating medium, being perfectly aware that it would produce distress and ruin to the laboring and business interests of the country. The House of Representatives on December 18, 1865, by a vote of 144 yeas to 6 nays, adopted the following:

Resolved, That this House cordially concur in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge co-operative action to this end as speedily as possible.

Here we have it clearly stated that, in order to resume "specie payments," contraction is a necessity, and, as nothing but bank currency requires "specie basis" and specie redemption, the object of contraction is to perpetuate the national-bank currency. To carry out this plot has taken the bread out of the mouths of our laboring and wealthproducing population to enrich the non-wealth-producing capitalists by special legislation. The man that is in favor of "specie basis" and "specie payments" is essentially an advocate and supporter of bank currency as opposed to the people's money or a full legal-tender United States Treasury note, which costs the Government very little to make it, but it costs the creditor of the Government a dollar to get it, and when made a full legal tender it will enable the holder of it to obtain its denominational value in return for it; whereas the national-bank currency costs the bondholder only 1 per cent. on the average amount of circulation, while the Government pays him about 10 per cent. per annum for taking it to loan to the people at from 6 to 12 per cent. per annum, giving the bondholder and banker from 16 to 22 per cent. per annum on his thirty-five or forty cents invested in each dollar's worth of bonds. Even though a representative of the people may be one of this highly favored class of bondholders and bankers, most certainly it does not justify him in voting to perpetuate a system so ruinous to the one not justify him in voting to perpetuate a system so rumous to the industrial interests of the country.

On April 12, 1866, Congress, unfortunately for the country, carried out their resolve of December, 1865, by passing an act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to receive any Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for any description of bonds authorized by the act (of March 3, 1865) to which that is an amendment, and also to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by said act, either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value which have been or which may be issued under either or any act of Congress, the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress; but nothing therein contained shall be construed to authorize any increase of the public debt; provided that of United States notes (green-backs) not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of that act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

The Secretary of the Treasury, under the remarkable powers given him by the act of 1866, the designing work of contraction, was begun, which in a short time raised such protests from the business gun, which in a short time raised such protests from the business men as to alarm Congressmen, causing them to pass an act to repeal so much of the act of April 12, 1866, as prevented any further contraction of the greenbacks, but did not stop the contraction of Treasury notes bearing interest, and certificates of indebtedness and of deposit, amounting to over $1,200,000,000. This repealing act was passed in January, 1868; it was returned without the signature of the President, but it was not returned within the time prescribed by the Constitution, and therefore it became a law on February 4, 1868, without his approval. The people, not having critically examined the Constitution, and therefore it became a law on February 4, 1863, without his approval. The people, not having critically examined the designing act of April 12, 1866, were deceived by the repealing act of 1868, supposing that the contraction of the circulating medium was stopped, whereas it was rapidly and stealthily carried on by the Secretary of the Treasury, producing the commercial crash and money panic of 1873, causing the prostration of our industries and the pecuniary ruin of thousands upon thousands of worthy business men, who knew nothing of the danger that threatened them.

I will now show that the bondholders and bankers, in whose interest contraction was begun and carried on, knew perfectly well what result it would produce, as is shown by the following correspondence: From Buffalo, New York, on December 4, 1866, Mr. Spaulding wrote to Secretary McCulloch as follows:

* * * You no doubt now, to a large extent, have control of the finances of the country, and I think that you will, of necessity, contract moderately so as to preserve a tolerably easy money market. * * * There may be occasional spasms and tightness for money, * * * but generally I shall look for plenty of money * * * for at least a year to come."

To this McCulloch, on December 7, 1866, replied as follows:

* * My object has been to keep the market steady, and to work back to specie payments without a financial collapse. I shall act in the future, as I have in the past, with great caution, and attempt no impracticable thing.

From Buffalo, New York, on January 22, 1867, Mr. Spaulding wrote to Mr. Hubbard, Comptroller of the Currency, as follows:

to Mr. Hubbard, Comptroller of the Currency, as follows:

The act of Congress passed on the 12th of April last [1866] it seems to me is a wise and judicious measure. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell 5.20 gold bonds, and with the proceeds to retire 6 per cent. compound interest notes and plain legal-tender greenback currency and other indebtedness of the Government, but not to retire more than $4,000,000 of greenbacks a month, or $4,000,000 in a year, but without restriction as to the amount of compound sixes [and seven-thirties] that may be retired during any week or month, [into long bonds.] This law is discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury. Power is given him to contract the currency; but he will no doubt use his discretionary power prudently, and not retire either greenbacks or compounds [and seven-thirties] any faster than a ten as the done without materially disturbing the legitimate business of the country.

it can be done without materially disturbing the legitimate business of the country. * * *

The Secretary will no doubt, by a mederate and prudent course of contraction, endeavor to keep the business and industry of the nation in a prosperous condition, * * * gradually reduce prices, and bring greenbacks and national currency nearer the specie standard. [Greenbacks could have been made equal to gold coin at any time by making them a full legal tender.] On this point the Secretary, in his last annual report, makes the following judicious remarks:

"How rapidly the United States notes may be retired must depend upon the effect which contraction may have upon business and industry, and can be better determined as the work progresses. * * The policy of contracting the circulation of Government notes should be definitely and unchangeably established, and the process should go on, just as rapidly as possible, without producing a financial crisis, or seriously embarrassing those branches of industry and trade upon which our revenues are dependent. As the volume of currency is reduced, it will increase in value; and as soon as the specie standard is reached, the national banks will be obliged to redeem their circulating notes in specie."

No remarks are necessary on this correspondence, as it speaks for

No remarks are necessary on this correspondence, as it speaks for itself and proves conclusively that the knowing ones were perfectly aware of the result that so thorough a contraction must produce.

I shall now refer to the designing act of March 18, 1869, which reads as follows :

reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That * * * it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, [greenbacks,] and of all interest bearing obligations, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver: [that other lawful currency being greenbacks:] but none of the said interest bearing obligations [5.20 bonds] not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such times as United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be paid or sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

That the designing character of this remarkable not may be the

That the designing character of this remarkable act may be the more apparent, be it observed, first, it provides that greenbacks shall more apparent, be it observed, first, it provides that greenbacks shall be paid in coin or its equivalent; second, it admits that there are bonds redeemable or payable in greenbacks not full legal tenders; third, it prohibits the payment of those bonds before the expiration of twenty years from the date of issue unless they can be paid in coin, which they knew could not be done; fourth, they foreshadowed their purpose to perpetuate the bonded indebtedness of the Federal Government by converting overdue or redeemable 5.20 bonds into bonds that could not be paid off for a long period of years, bearing a moiety less interest than the 5.20 bonds; and, fifth, they presumed to pledge the public faith to make the greenbacks "bills of credit" or redeemable in coin at some future time, which would be a usurpation of power ble in coin at some future time, which would be a usurpation of power not granted to Congress, but purposely denied it, and would be a certain means of further dishonoring and depreciating greenbacks.

On the day this act was approved the premium on gold was 30 per cent., there were over $1,400,000,000 of 5.20 bonds, redeemable in green-backs, which increased the obligations of the people as tax-payers $400,000,000 for the benefit of bondholders.

Senator Morron, of my own State, in the Senate, in relation to the act of March 18, 1869, said:

What is the purpose of it, and what will be the effect of it? Simply to raise the price of bonds in the market and to put money into the hands of the speculators. Sir, it is understood, I believe, that the passage of a bill of this kind would have the effect in Europe, where our financial questions are not well understood, to increase the price of our bonds and increase the demand; and that will enable the great operators to sell the bonds they have on hand at a profit. It is in its nature a broker's operation. It is a "bull" movement, intended to put up the price of bonds for the interest of parties dealing in them.

And yet Congress presumed to pledge the faith of the people to an act passed in bad faith toward their constituents and in disregard of their rights and interests. These acts have been condemned by the people, and most of the authors of them have been retired from seats in this House to the shades of private life; and it does not become those who participated in those acts yet lingering in this House to lecture it upon the pledges they made in bad faith and in gross violation. lation of the rights of the people to promote the interests of bondholders and bankers.

Congress in 1865 admitted that the necessity for and direct object of contraction were to resume specie payments, to are direct object of contraction were to resume specie payments, to perpetuate the national-bank currency, and take from the people the legal-tender greenback. It is apparent that the act of 1869 and the refunding acts were designed to perpetuate the bonds, making them a perpetual burden on the people, to be met by heavy taxation, creating a necessity for an excessively high tariff to enrich manufacturers at the expense of governments and to give to the headdledge a perpetual and pense of consumers, and to give to the bondholder a perpetual and steady source of income, payable semi-annually in gold coin bearing a premium, with exemption from State and local taxation, that their children may be educated out of the taxes of the toiling millions, and finally to establish and maintain in perpetuity a moneyed aristocracy

Mr. Speaker, the people propose to pay off or buy in this bonded indebtedness with par money, and by so doing to put in circulation the money necessary to revive, make active and prosperous the wealth-producing industries of the country, and have sent us here to carry out this policy. Shall we do our duty to our constituents or shall we sit idly in this Hall in dread of the gods of Mammon? Let us have action. If one national bank with a capital of only thirty-free will sent accountry and active to the words and illustries of the control and illustries of the state of the five millions was considered dangerous to the morals and liberties of our country by General Jackson in 1832, how much more dangerous is over two thousand such tyrannical and corrupting institutions. Let us act promptly and with determination.

THE SOLE CAUSE OF PANICS.

The advocates of contraction and of bank currency deny that any contraction of the circulating medium has taken place, and also that contraction caused the crash and panic of 1873. I will prove that contraction uniformly produces such results and that the circulating medium, principally composed of Treasury notes (bearing interest) and greenbacks, has been contracted since April 12, 1856, over $1,200,000,000.

A contraction of bank currency of only $23,000,000 from 1816 to 1820 caused the crash, panic, and distress at that time. A contraction of $83,000,000 from 1837 to 1843 caused the crash and panic of that period. A contraction of forty-nine millions from 1854 to 1857 caused the crash and panic that took place in 1857. A contraction of twenty-three millions from 1860 to 1852 produced the money panic and suspension of specie payments in December, 1861. The volume of State-bank currency in 1863 was two hundred and two millions, which they were unable to redeem in specie.

The following was the volume of money, currency, and circulating medium (exclusive of coin) on September 1, 1865:

Fractional currency	26, 344, 742 217, 024, 160

Total amount of Treasury notes and certificates of the Treasury 1, 732, 811, 195

Total circulating medium December 1, 1873.....

Showing a contraction of $1,210,999,085 from 1865 to 1873, which was stealthily carried on under the act of April 12, 1866. In the face of these facts no man can deny that the crash and money panic of 1873 were caused by this enormous contraction of over $1,200,000,000 of circulating medium.

Previous to 1863 a contraction of from twenty-five to eighty millions of dollars would produce a commercial crash and money panic; but in 1873 it required a contraction of hundreds of millions of dollars to produce such a result, for the obvious reason that from 1820 to 1862 the business of the country was carried on under the credit system, forced on it by bank currency requiring redemption in lawful money. The basis being limited and insufficient for the wants of trade, commodities had to be sold and bought on credit; consequently business men were in debt, and then a small contraction would produce a crash and a panic; whereas in 1866 there was an abundance of circulating medium, enabling commodities to be bought and sold for cash. Business men were mainly out of debt, and therefore it required a large contraction of the circulating medium to force the credit system on the country; and as contraction was carried on, credit was sub-stituted for the cash withdrawn from circulation, resulting in 1873 in such an expansion of credit as enabled a crash and money panic to be produced; once more placing the labor and wealth-producing in-dustries of the country at the mercy of note-shavers and dealers in "credit currency."

The congressional resolution of December, 1865, frankly asserts the necessity of contraction to maintain the useless and expensive national-bank system of currency, which policy is designed to perpetuate the system of bank currency and force the country to do business on credit, so dangerous to business men and so profitable to moneylenders and note-shavers, carried out under the act of April 12, 1866, by the same Congress, authorizing the notes and certificates of the Treasury to be contracted, and the act of Congress of February 4, 1868, prohibiting any further contraction of the Treasury notes known as "greenbacks" than the $44,000,000 then retired by the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of April 12, 1866.

In proof of the fact that those who make such a denial know betthe proof of the fact that those who make such a denial know better, and do it knowing that a large actual contraction has taken place since April 12, 1866, I quote from the President's message of December, 1873. He says, "In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency." Certainly, the President, as the representative of the contraction and bank-currency faction, had no interest or motive to induce him to make such an admission had it not been true and easily substantiated by the acts of Congress and an inspection of the books of the Treasury. The advocates of this bank-currency system also deny that the $830,000,000 of Treasury notes, legal-tenders bearing two cents interest per day on each one hundred dollars in lawful money and convertible into 5.20 bonds in three years, together with other Treasury notes, legal-tenders, bearing interest and convertible into 5.20 bonds after one, two, and three years, were used as a circulating medium. In proof of the fact that they also make this denial knowing that they were so used, I quote from the reports of Secretaries Fessenden of 1864, and McCulloch of 1865. Secretay Fessenden, in his report of 1864, says:

Of 5 per cent interest-bearing notes there were outstanding on the 1st day of November, 1864, $20,519,110. To a considerable extent these notes have been and will continue to be used as currency.

In the same report he also says that he paid out many millions of the 7.3 notes to officers in the Army in lieu of the ordinary currency—meaning Treasury notes not bearing interest—which, previous to July 1, 1863, were convertible into a 6 per cent. 5.20 bond at the pleasure of the holder.

Secretary McCulloch, in his report of 1865, says that these (7.3) notes were extensively used as currency, and for that reason ought to notes were extensively used as currency, and for that reason ought to be withdrawn, and urged a contraction of the currency. Unfortunately for the country, Congress carried out the contraction policy advised by McCulloch in the interest of those who had plotted to fasten on the country a bank-currency oligarchy. The people demand a halt in this ruinous policy, and will have their will respected sooner or later; it is only a question of time.

The only policy proposed to us by the advocates of bank currency is continued contraction, more distress to the wealth-producing industries of the country in order to return to coin basis for bank cur-dustries of the country, in order to return to coin basis for bank currency and specie payments.

In the face of all the facts which I have shown, I ask the advocates of bank currency why they persist in a denial of the fact that "a great contraction" has taken place, and why they also deny that it caused the commercial crash and money panic of 1873?

They do it because they do not wish to apply the only remedy that ever has been applied to remove the effects of a commercial crash and money period. Moreover, if they are the effects of a commercial crash and money panic. Moreover, if they were to admit the truth, they could not defend the resumption act or any other measure looking to contraction. Their professed ignorance of well-established facts is their only excuse for turning a deaf ear to the demands of a distressed people for relief.

Mr. Speaker, these advocates of bank currency tell us that they want to come down to a "solid basis," to touch "hard pan." I am in faver of placing the business of the country on a solid basis, but not on one which produces bankruptcy and takes the bread out of the month of the laborer, and surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with the surrounds him with his wife and children with him with his wife and children with him with his wife and children with him dren suffering from hunger and nakedness, while he is willing to work and begging for employment and can obtain none, although money-dealers say that money and currency are abundant. They may be abundant with bondholders and bankers, but money is not abunand for general business purposes, or it would not command so high a rate of interest as it now does. When money is plenty, the interest on it is low; when it is scarce, the interest is high, as at present; and to-day we witness the remarkable spectacle of real estate and the productions of the farmerand the manufacturer falling in price and the value of money going up, with an increased cost of producing, as contraction goes on.

The solid basis I want is the entire wealth of this country as a basis for full legal-tender or par money of sufficient volume to revive and make active the wealth-producing industries of the country, lowering the rate of interest on money, and thus cheapening the cost of productions, without imposing unjust wages upon the laborer; increasing our exports until the balance of trade shall be in favor of

No individual is on a safe or solid basis unless he has more credit than he has occasion to use. And I have no confidence in the business capacity or judgment of any man in this House who thinks or affects to believe that it is possible to resume and maintain specie payments with the balance of trade against us, our productive industries crippled or prostrated, our laborers out of employment, and the capital that employs labor and produces wealth commanding from 10 to 12 per cent. per annum more than the business capital pays in the countries with which we must compete; a difference and difficulty which no amount of tariff subsidy to manufacturers will enable them which no amount of tariff subsidy to manufacturers will enable them to overcome, so long as the currency is scarce, producing usurious rates of interest, beyond what labor can earn, on the money that employs the laborer; and so long as it is concentrated into the hands of bondholders and bankers, who draw interest on their bonds, with exemption from State and local taxation, and can lock up the currency and live, until the laborer and those whose business it is to produce wealth and the state of the state o duce wealth are starved into slavish submission to the unjust de-mands of speculative capitalists.

Mr. Speaker, this question of a return to specie payments, as an excuse for contraction, has not been entertained by me for one moment, and shall not be, producing, as it has, the present ruinous state of affairs; and no vote will I give in favor of any measure looking toward permanently fastening on the people an institution that periodically prostrates our industries, controls the volume and regulates the value of currency; an institution that expands and contracts the circulating medium at the pleasure of selfish speculators, who never risk a dollar in producing wealth, and who insist on maintaining the legislation dictated by them, which has enriched them and impover-ished wealth-producers. Never shall this interest command my vote or support until it shall have shown itself willing to aid in placing the business of the country on that solid basis indicated by me. I will not make myself responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the continued and increasing distress of my countrymen, produced by the contraction policy

The proper remedies are easily applied, and would be instantaneous in their operation; but in consequence of this conflict between aristocratic and democratic republican forms of governments, legislative relief, so imperatively demanded by the interests of the people, is delayed, although this House is largely controlled by Representatives elected by democrats and independent republicans, who desire full legal-tender money and its substitution for the national-bank currency, and the prohibition of banks of issue.

Why shall Congress give to individuals or corporations the high power to make a currency and regulate its value and volume? The powers of Congress are delegated, and not sovereign; therefore I ask by what part of the Constitution is Congress authorized to give up to speculators a power delegated to it only? Mr. Webster, in a constiutional argument on this subject, said:

The whole control over the standard of value and medium of payments is vested in the General Government.

That this is a correct conclusion is obvious, from the fact, that the Constitution does not contain any clause granting to Congress the power to issue a note or "public bill," authorized by law to circulate as money or currency, promising payment in lawful money; and, as such a power was purposely and by a distinct vote of the framing convention denied to Congress, it would be an act of usurpation to assume it or confer on individuals or corporations a power not delegated to Congress, and destructive of the public good.

For the past fifteen years the eastern bondholders and bankers have controlled the legislation of Congress in their own interest, to the injury and oppression of the great agricultural and commercial interests of the country. Their "cunningly-devised scheme" to make the interest on bonds and duties on imported goods payable in gold coin, as the only full legal-tender money, creating an increased demand for it, and thereby creating a premium on it by law, which act Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, denounced, as I have shown; and Mr. Spaulding, in his speech on the 19th of February, 1862, in opposition to the Senate amendments, said:

Senate amendments, said:

Who are they that ask to have a preference given to them over other creditors of the Government! Sir, it is a class of men very sharp in all money transactions. They are not among those who by their labor and skill make the wealth of the country. * * Men who are willing to lend money to the Government, if you will make the security beyond all question, give them a high rate of interest, and make it payable in coin. * * Sir, the legal-tender Treasury-note bill was intended to avoid all such financiering, and protect the Government, and the people who pay taxes, from all such hard bargains. * * * In every aspect in which you view this hard-money provision its practical working will be disastrous.

As soon as the country was at peace, these bankers and money-lenders generally, in bad faith with the people, exerted their power to procure legislation to compel the people to pay the 5.20 bonds in gold coin in order to defer the payment of them, as they knew there was not the gold coin in the country to do it with as those bonds became redeemable; nor could it be obtained under the contraction act of 1866. It is obvious that the purpose was to perpetuate the interest on the bonds, to be met by heavy taxation as a perpetual burden on on the bonds, to be met by neavy taxation as a perpetual burden on the labor and industries of the country.

How much longer are we to be compelled to endure the yoke of servitude which a selfish and covetous interest has plotted to fasten on us and our constituents? There are gentlemen on the floor of this House, honored as representatives of the people, who are officers of national banks, and freely admit that a respect for the rights of the people makes it our duty to make the greenback a full legal tender, and substitute it for the national hank currency, and let hankers. and substitute it for the national-bank currency, and let bankers do business with the people's money. Why should we hesitate or delay to meet this issue, forced on us by those who wish to still longer enjoy the immense advantage of supplying the people with bank currency, instead of allowing them to have and use their own paper money, which may be made and maintained on an equality with gold coin?

Are we to be deterred from acting on this question because the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blanke] has informed this House and the country, in his speech of the 9th instant in defense of the nationalbank currency, that to abolish banks of issue or substitute the full legal-tender greenback for the national-bank currency would place "the currency wholly in the power and under the control of Congress?" There is where the Constitution puts it. But the gentleman from Maine says that Congress is "utterly unfitted to determine from time to time the amount of circulation required by the wants of trade. But indeed no body of men could be intrusted with that power." And yet he advises Congress to continue to confide that power to national bankers, especially under the late law of Congress, which makes national banking free to all bondholders by depositing their bonds in the Treasury and getting 90 per cent. of their face value in national-bank currency requiring redemption, to lend at such rates of interest as can be squeezed out of needy borrowers who are brought into the clutches of these "credit-mongers" by an expansion of a redeemable currency—mere evidences of debts due the public by bankers equal to the bonded indebtedness of the Federal Government less 10 per cent. The next operation is to put their subsidy currency out on interest, secured by well-indorsed notes, and thus induce every business man to extend his business to its utmost limit. Just at that point these bankers remember that their currency calls for redeemption in lawful money on demand; and, as they have not the means with which to redeem it, they begin to contract discounts, calling for payments of their loans, which contracts the circulating medium, producing a pressure in business circles, then a crash and a panic; and having no means to pay their notes in lawful money, they lock their doors and cooly retire, sneering in disgust at the lunatics who are fools enough to imagine that the promise to redeem bank currency in greenbacks or coin was made to be performed.

Such is the see-saw, the up and down, expansion and contraction policy and process of banks of issue, and it is to these bankers that the gentleman from Maine would hand over the power to regulate the volume and value of money. This is the result of studying political economy out of books in a law office, where a rich creditor as a client is always welcome, no matter what becomes of the poor deluded debtor who was foolish enough to take the advice of the gentleman from Maine, and trust the banks to regulate "the wants of trade," and fix the price of land, and of every commodity throughout the country. Instead of wasting time in studying books on political economy, written in the interest of bank currency and of speculative economy, written in the interest of bank currency and of speculative capitalists generally, the gentleman will find it more profitable to study the wants and interests of business capitalists. Moreover, besides having spent his time in studying the interests of banks of issue, as he doubts the capacity of the people's representatives to be trusted with carrying out the fundamental law by which our acts must be governed, it would seem that he has also been devoting some of his attention to studying the views of the Hamilton school of statesmen, who as I have shown doubted the capacity of the result for men, who, as I have shown, doubted the capacity of the people for self-government, and thought that system of government best which takes care of the rich and leaves them to protect the poor.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat it, it is this conflict between two widely different systems of government that makes this contest necessary between full legal-tender money and bank currency requiring redemption in legal-tender money. The contest is not between gold and silver coin and legal-tender Treasury notes; no conflict can arise between them if they are made by law to perform the same functions. The contest is between the paper money of the people, which does not need redemption in other money, and the promissory notes of banks of issue. The volume of legal-tender money has a very safe limit fixed to it. Congress cannot pass any law, constitutionally, to limit fixed to it. Congress cannot pass any law, constitutionally, to pay out money for any other purpose than to pay constitutional and lawful demands on the Treasury, and it is the duty of Congress to pay a debt at the earliest moment possible, that not one dollar of tax-ation may be drawn from the people to pay interest on a suspended debt for the want of par money to pay it with, so long as the high prerogative is in Congress to make money, and regulate its value, by making it a full legal tender; being the only way in which Congress can give it a fixed or unfluctuating value.

The great delusion of the gentleman from Maine consists in his mistaking a medium of exchange or a tool of trade for wealth. Money, taking a medium of exchange or a tool of trade for wealth. Money, or a legal tender, is not wealth; it is simply the means of exchanging commodities and of paying debts. Although it may cost the Government very little to make a legal-tender paper dollar, whoever gets it out of the Treasury lawfully must give a dollar for it, and being a full legal tender, it will be certain to get him its full denominational value in exchange for it. Being based on all the wealth of the country, including its bullion or coin, it is therefore a representative of wealth or value, and may justly be required to be taken at its denominational value. But when gold coin is made a tender, it being made of a commodity constituting a portion of the wealth of the made of a commodity constituting a portion of the wealth of the country, it must be tendered by weight according to its actual commercial value; the value of coin can only be determined by its weight. That the paper dollar may maintain a steady unfluctuating value, without being affected by the change in values of the commodities it represents, it is only necessary to make it, at the pleasure of the holder, convertible into a certificate of deposit or bond payable on demand, and bearing an accommodation rate of interest; and when the paper dollar is made a full legal tender, performing all the functions of money, it does not require redemption, as there is nothing superior

The gentleman from Maine says that "no wisdom of legislation has The gentleman from Maine says that "no wisdom of legislation has been able to avert the periodical revulsion in trade common to all commercial nations." I have shown that the crash and panic of 1873 were caused by an act of Congress, and not as formerly, until 1862, by the banks suddenly expanding and as suddenly contracting their currency. An act of Congress did it to maintain bank currency; and so far from "the wisdom of legislation" having "been able to avert it," none has been tried. On the contrary, legislation has been made by Congress since September, 1873, increasing the evils of taking from the people the necessary volume of circulating medium; a policy begun in 1866 in the interest of bondholders and bankers.

THE MANIFEST REMEDIES

The cause of a disease being known, it is easy to know what remedy to apply. As contraction caused the crash and panic of 1873, and has been carried on by the resumption act of 1875, remove the cause and the industries of the country will revive. For this purpose I pro-

First. An act unconditionally repealing the resumption act of January 14, 1875.

Second. An act of Congress making coin and United States Treasury notes full or equal legal tenders, leaving specific contracts to be carried out or paid in such money as may have been specifically stated Third. An act substituting par United States notes for the national-bank currency.

Fourth. An act making par greenbacks convertible at the pleasure of the holder into a certificate of deposit or bond bearing a low or an accommodation rate of interest, which certificate or bond shall be made payable in lawful money on demand.

The resumption act should be repealed, because it is causing a still further contraction of the circulating medium and is more and more, day by day, increasing the difficulties of business men, decreasing the value of lands and of all commodities of barter; thus giving money and currency more and more an undue purchasing power.

Its repeal will have the effect of enabling bankers to put their currency into circulation without any fear of a run on them for redemption, which will aid in reviving the industries. It will prevent the further retiring national-bank currency (lying idle in the bank vaults in consequence of the stagnation of the general business of the country) in order to lift bonds bearing an increased premium, in consequence of this resumption act and the act of March, 18, 1869, which was one of the designs of its authors, as I have above.

of the designs of its authors, as I have shown.

The passage of an act making United States Treasury notes and silver full or equal legal tenders with gold coin would make them equal to each other as money, and would give us real or par money, causing real values to lands, houses, and all salable commodities; it would destroy the premium on gold coin, which would dispense with the gold-gambling rooms of Wall street and elsewhere, and would reduce the state of distinct was a state of the state o duce the cost of living and of doing business equal to the fluctuating premium that gold commands in consequence of it being the only full legal tender.

In reply to those who have thoughtlessly asserted that by making coin and United States notes equal legal tenders would compel the purchase of coin to pay the interest on our bonds driven to Europe by a contraction of the United States Treasury notes, I call their at-tention to the following remarkable facts:

At the conclusion of the late contest between France and Prussia,

At the conclusion of the late contest between France and Prussia, France was in a seemingly ruined condition. Prussia held armed possession of Paris and demanded the payment of over a thousand millions of dollars as an indemnity. To meet it, the notes of the royal Bank of France were made full legal tenders, and the bank was prohibited from redeeming its notes in coin. The bank was authorized to issue over $400,000,000 in full legal-tender notes. The French government borrowed $300,000,000 of the bank at 1 per cent. per annum. When the notes were first issued, money-changers rated them at 2½ per cent. discount; the bank was authorized to issue $200,000,000 more of these notes when they became equal to coin in value; they rewhen the lottes were first issued, money-changers rated them at 27 per cent. discount; the bank was authorized to issue $200,000,000 more of those notes, when they became equal to coin in value; they revived and made active the wealth-producing industries of France, renewing its exportations, and thus producing the balance of trade in favor of France, causing an influx of the precious metals. In the mean time the French government, to make the stipulated payments of the indemnity, took the full legal-tender notes of the bank and purchased foreign bills of exchange, thus enabling the French government to obtain the means of paying its indemnity to Prussia in advance of the times of payment stipulated. The Bank of France is still prohibited from redeeming its notes in coin; they are continuously on an equality or par with coin. France is in a highly prosperous condition; the French government is rapidly paying the loan made it by the bank, which is reducing its paper circulation to make a channel of circulation for the coin flowing into France.

No candid man who properly considers these indisputable facts will assert that by making Treasury notes and coin equal legal tenders would compel the Federal Government to purchase coin to pay interest abroad or at home. I think that no one will presume to assert that the credit of the Federal Government and its full legal-tender Treasury credit of the Federal Government and its full legal-tender Tressury notes would not be equal to the credit of the royal Bank of France and its notes, backed by the French government.

That our full legal-tender Treasury notes would be par with gold coin, and would purchase exchange on Europe as favorably as gold coin, there cannot be a question of doubt; because they will purchase, at the same price as coin, all commodities of exportation that command coin in Europe.

There is one other fact in connection with this subject of French experience which it is proper to call to the notice of this House. That fact relates to the volume of the circulating medium required in France to make its industries prosperous. France has a population about equal to the population of this country; its territory being much smaller and the population more compact, its money circulates more freely, and a less volume will accomplish as great an amount of trade there as here. The total amount of circulation in France by the lowest estimates the country of the country o timate, as stated by Bagehot's Lombard Street, North American Review January, 1874, and Review of the Two Worlds, November 1, 1873, is $1,250,000,000, with a population of 36,102,921, gives an amount of money per head of $34.62; and of this amount of circulating medium $700,000,000 is in coin; whereas the circulating medium of this country is stated by the same anthority at $869,000,000, making a total circulation per head of $21.72; by deducting a reserve fund of only $200,000,000, it would be an amount per head of only $16.72, as compared with that of France, amounting to $34.62. If those who assume to be statesmen can learn no useful lesson from these facts to profit by, all common-sense experienced business men can. Money may be too abundant in this country to promote the interest of those who have a cash capital and are engaged in the trade of money-lending and note-shaving, but that it is far below the wants of the productive industries and the interests of tax-payers, there is not a question of doubt in my mind.

My third proposition is to pass an act substituting par Treasury notes for national-bank currency. This would be a saving to the tax-payers of over $20,000,000 annually, and, had the national banks never been incorporated and State banks of issue been abolished, the Treasury note made a full legal tender and been used to redeem the 5.20 bonds as they became redeemable, we would now have at least $1.200,000,000,000 lease of the right payments will be a few to the same redeemable. $1,200,000,000 less debt with some sixty millions less taxation, and we would have avoided a commercial crash and money panic, and thousands of business men would have avoided the ruin and poverty to which they have been subjected by a stealthy contraction of over $1,200,000,000 in the interest of bondholders and bankers.

Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts, I am at a loss to understand why democrats should hesitate about what course to take on this question, when there is but one correct course to be taken. The national statement of the statement of t of a special class at the expense of the public good, ever have and ever will oppose sound democracy and genuine republicanism, and any attempt to compromise with such an interest is in my judgment useless. Divided, as the House and Senate are, and threatened by a presidential veto, we may be compelled for the present to accept less than should be done; but, for one, I am resolved not to compro-mise any principle to obtain anything, as it could not result in advantage to the people.

Mr. Speaker, the fourth proposition is to make the Treasury notes interconvertible with certificates of deposit, or bonds bearing a low rate of interest, to insure the notes being kept on an equality with full legal-tendercoin; and if no more money is to be issued, it will be a measure indispensably necessary to open loans by offering a low-interestbearing bond; to loan the money now in circulation, to buy up in the open market our bonds now in Europe, the interest on which greatly aids in keeping the balance of trade against us.

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the democratic party has one uniform record in favor of legal-tender coin and Treasury notes and of determined hostility to banks of issue. The democratic party in convention in New York in July, 1868, in its third resolution, says:

Payment of the public debt as speedily as practicable; * * * where the obliga-tions of the Government do not expressly state upon their face or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and in justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States. [Thunders of and in justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States. [Thunders of applause.]

Fourth. Equal taxation of every species of property according to its real value, including Government bonds and other public securities. [Renewed cheering, and cries of "Read it again!"]

Fifth. One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the office-holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder. [Great cheering, and cries of "Read it again!" The fifth resolution was again read and againcheered.]

Sixth. Economy in the administration of the Government, the reduction of the standing Army and Navy, [great cheering.] * * * discontinuance of inquisitorial modes of assessing and collecting internal revenue, so that the burdens of taxation may be equalized and lessened, the credit of the Government and the currency made good.

We have this clear appropring the third democratic party so

We have this clear announcement by the democratic party so early as 1868 in favor of the popular doctrines of to-day. I had the honor to be for them then, as one of their original advocates. I am for them now, against any and all opposition. I am prepared to stand by these principles as an issue superior to all other questions of public policy; they do not admit of any compromise whatever. The credit of the Government can only be made good by paying its debts, and its currency can only be made good or par by making it an equal legal tender with gold coin; and I am for its being done without further delay.

Mr. Speaker, carry out these principles, and Government will no longer "take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned." If Representatives in this House honestly desire to give the people par money, and to restore gold and silver to circulation, and to maintain the good faith and credit of the Federal Government, Congress must pass an act to enable the Government to honor its own paper by re-ceiving it for all dues to the maker of it, as it cannot be done by

I again call the attention of this House, and especially the attention of the gentleman from Maine, to the fact that the contest is between United States notes and bank currency and banks of issue. Our opposition is to all banks of issue, "bills of credit," and all kinds of depreciated money and currency.

"Bank currency must be suppressed and the circulation restored to the nation, to whom it belongs." This was the battle-cry of Jeffer-son and of Jackson; and fidelity to the people requires us to stop contraction; substitute full legal-tender convertible United States contraction; substitute full legal-tender convertible United States notes for bank currency; prohibit banks of issue; expand the constitutional money of the Federal Government by paying its debts until the volume "shall be equal to the wants of trade;" stop all useless taxation; repeal the odious, demoralizing, and unjust excise or internal-revenue laws; revive the wealth-producing industries and general business, that the laborer may be employed and promptly paid, even though there should be a surplus of money, as it is better that money should be idle than labor. The man who has more money than he can profitably employ or put at interest is in no danger of starvation, and is therefore not a subject for our charities in this crisis.

The facts I have referred to prove—
First. That Congress has unlimited control over the money question.

First. That Congress has unlimited control over the money question. Second. The Constitution does not compel Congress to make gold, silver, or anything else a legal tender.

Third. Congress only can coin and make money and regulate its value by a full legal-tender act.

Fourth. Congress can neither issue a "bill of credit" constitutionally nor authorize it to be done.

Fifth. No State can coin money or emit a "bill of credit" nor authorize it to be done, nor make coin a tender in payment of debts, unless Congress fails to do so.

During the delivery of the above remarks, when Mr. Landers, of Indiana, had occupied the floor for one hour,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYMOND. I ask that by unanimous consent the time of my colleague be extended.

There was no objection, and Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, resumed his remarks. Subsequently,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The gentleman's second hour has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be further extended.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I have but a little more to say.

There was no objection, and the gentleman's time was further extended.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, then resumed and concluded his speech, as printed above.

And then, on motion of Mr. DURHAM, (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in the nature of a memorial, with regard to national finances. The importance of the topics treated in this memorial and the respectable source from which it comes would lead me to selve the Source to print the memorial and comes, would lead me to ask the Senate to print the memorial, but for the fact that a print in convenient form has been sent, I think, to each of the members of the Senate. Therefore I abstain from making that request, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia, reported it with an amendment.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1590) to remedy an error in enrollment, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. This bill is merely to correct an omission in the enrollment of an act passed at the last session, and I ask for its present consideration. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It recites that in the bill for sundry civil expenses, approved March 3, 1875, of the amount therein provided for the improvement of the Capitol grounds, the sum of $50,000 was made available from the passage of the act; and that the clause relating to the immediate availability of that sum was omitted in the enrollment of that act. It is therefore provided that the sum of $6,000 kg area when thereof as war, he received to the provider that the sum of the enrollment of that act. It is therefore provided that the sum of $6,699.18, or as much thereof as may be necessary to pay liabilities incurred during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, for labor, &c., in the improvement of the Capitol grounds, is rendered available for that purpose, the sum to be paid out of the funds provided in the bill approved March 3, 1875, for the improvement of the Capitol grounds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading read the third time and record.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS,

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That Lewis Stearn be allowed to withdraw his petition from the files of the Senate.

There being an adverse report in that case, the order will be made on leaving copies of the papers.

Ordered. That Abraham Sellers, administrator of Frederick Vincent, deceased, formerly administrator of James La Caze, late of the firm of La Caze & Mallett, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the file of the Senate.

In that case an adverse report has been made, and the order to withdraw will be made on a like condition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

DEBATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved. That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess; and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate.

This is the usual resolution which the Senate has heretofore adopted about this time of the session; and if there is no objection, I ask for its present consideration. If any Senator desires it to go over, I have no objection to that course being taken.

Mr. WEST. I prefer that we should not apply that rule quite yet. Let it lie over to-day any way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being raised, the resolution goes over

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the resolution be printed. The motion was agreed to.

COLORADO ENABLING ACT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1328, reported from the Committee on Territories, amending the act relating to the admission of Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends so much of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to enable It amends so much of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, as reads, "and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitu-tion as may be formed by said convention," so as to read: "And all who are qualified voters of said Territory under the laws thereof at such time as the constitution to be framed shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection shall be entitled to vote upon the people for ratification or rejection shall be entitled to vote upon the question of such ratification or rejection."

The second section amends section 13 of the act by adding: "And if the balance of said legislative appropriations does not amount to the sum of $20,000, then there shall be, and there hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient, with the said unexpended appropriations, to make the sum of $20,000, which shall be used for the purposes aforesaid: Provided That any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such Provided, That any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purposes shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, I ask the Senator from Nebraska who has reported this bill to make some statement in regard to its provisions by way of explanation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I stated when the bill was reported by the committee that there were but two points involved in this bill. First is a provision by which the emigrants who have gone into the Territory since the passage of the enabling act and have now become citizens and voters in the Territory under the provisions of the terricitizens and voters in the Territory under the provisions of the territorial law shall be allowed to vote on the question of the adoption or rejection of the State constitution. The original act as it came from the House provided for a convention to be held very soon after the passage of the act. The Senate, by amendments agreed upon here, deferred the meeting of the constitutional convention for about a year and a half, and the voting upon the adoption or rejection of that constitution until the 4th of July next. Consequently, since the passage of the act, and before the voting upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution, a large number of emigrants will have become voters in the Territory. That is the first amendment proposed

The second is in regard to the pay of the members of the constitutional convention. The provision of the original act was that the balance of the appropriations for legislative expenses of the Territory should be applied for the payment of the members of the constitutional convention. Had that convention been held as was contemplated by the original act, that appropriation would have been ample; but the deferring of the holding of the convention for a year and a half made a meeting of the territorial Legislature in the mean time of $20,000 to defray the expenses of this convention. I do not understand that it has been the usage of the Senate at any time to make such an appropriation. It may be a proper thing to do; but I am not aware of any precedent for the appropriation of money to pay the expenses of a convention to adopt a constitution for a new State. I believe there is a single instance that approaches this, and that was in the case of Nebraska, where an appropriation had been made for the expenses of the Legislature, and there was a provision in the law that any balance of that appropriation unexpended might be used to pay the expenses of the constitutional convention. I do not feel any spirit of opposition to this in any way; but as it is an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, not in harmony, I understand, with the usage in such cases, I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to that fact.

I think the principle itself is pernicious in practice. If the people are in a condition to become a State, to ask to be organized into a State government, when they undertake that duty it seems to me the Government of the United States should be relieved from responsibility for all expenses of that sort. Besides, it is not certain whether they will adopt the constitution or not; and they may come here again. But I content myself with simply calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that here is an appropriation of $20,000 to pay the expenses of a convention to organize a State government.

Perhaps I have not made myself quite understood as to the question of precedents. I have said there is no precedent for this; but that is to be taken with the qualification that in the case of Nebraska there was an appropriation for legislative expenditures, and if there should be anything left over, it was provided that that might be applied to pay the expenses of the convention. But that is not this case. In this instance, in 1874, there was a similar provision in an appropriation for legislative expenses, which if not expended might be applied to the convention; but this bill now provides for appropriating a sum equal to $20,000, provided that the balance left over of the legislative appropriation shall not be sufficient.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All I have to say in regard to the matter of precedent is that in the case of the last State which was admitted into this Union—my own State—the members of the constitutional convention were paid. Of course the circumstances are different in different Territories at different times. There have been volunteer conventions held to prepare constitutions, which constitutions have become the constitutions of the States; but here is a constitutional convention provided for by an act of Congress, and the payment of which was provided for in the act as originally drafted, and as originally passed, except that the meeting of the Legislature, which occurred in consequence of the deferring of action by the amendments adopted in the Senate, has used up the money which was then unexpended and on hand. Of course it is possible that the Senate will refuse to appropriate this amount of money. Such economy is possible for the Senate. The Senate at its last session, in the amendments then adopted to the enabling act, restricted Colorado and cut off in several respects appropriations and allowances which my own State was given in her enabling act. I hardly think such a policy is wise, and I hardly think the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, we have heard in this Congress a good deal about economy and retrenchment, and I trust the Senate will show that it is something more than a phrase and show it upon this bill. Here is unquestionably a new precedent. Here is a propowhich was provided for in the act as originally drafted, and as orig-

this bill. Here is unquestionably a new precedent. Here is a proposition to pay for the first time by direct appropriation the expenses of a constitutional convention of a State. In the case of Nebraska, any amount that might be left of a certain appropriation, possibly not fully expended, was allowed to be applied to this purpose. That I believe is the only case of the kind. We made a similar provision in the admission of Colorado, that any amount of the legislative expenses appropriation left over, supposing that there might be $5,000 or $10,000, perhaps, or $20,000 applicable for that purpose, should be applied to the expenses of the convention. It was not sufficient, or rather it was exhausted for the legitimate purpose for which it was provided, namely, for the territorial Legislature; and now the proposition is to take $20,000 directly from the Treasury in order to pay the expenses of the constitutional convention. I think it a great boon to the people of a Territory to be allowed to come into the Union and participate in the privileges of the Union, and the preliminary proceedings for that purpose should be paid for by themselves. That which they receive is worth the little amount of expense involved.

Year by year on every hand we increase these expenditures; we gradually eat into the Treasury. It is these discretionary items which use up the Treasury, not those amounts which are appropriated for the regular service of the Government; not the amounts necessary to pay a decent salary to a minister who represents us at St. Petersburg or St. James; not the amounts necessary to keep a consul at Pictou or Talcahuano, where, without his presence, our sailors may suffer or be left in foreign parts without any protection and our commerce crippled. It is not by reducing the salary of an overworked officer that true economy is shown; but it is in these items, necesofficer that true economy is shown; but it is in these items, necessary, and a large portion of the money appropriated has been expended for its expenses. The object of the second section is to supply that deficiency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As to the first provision of this bill, it is undoubtedly proper; but I think it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the second section, which provides for an appropriation. is a good principle. I know the result is that year by year the civil list increases. It is good economy to cut off expenditures of this kind, and we can. If gentlemen believe that there is anything in the pretension which they make that the people are overburdened with taxation, that they are staggering under the burden which we lay upon them, and if they really are desirous to avoid increasing those burdens, as they insist in our ears they do, here is a proper time and place to do it upon just such a bill as this. I certainly shall vote that way, and I think I do no injustice to Colorado by such a vote. I know when my State came into the Union it came in upon the rule which I have prescribed, and so all the other States came in with the exception of Nebraska, where there was a little amount which was allowed, you might say, to slop over for this purpose, and that ought not to have been done, but it ought to have been covered back into the Treasury. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to strike out the second section of the

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have heard, Mr. President, of saving at the spigot and spending from the bung-hole; I have heard of such a thing as men being "penny-wise and pound-foolish," and I think, if we want to make a conspicuous example of that kind of economy, this Senate should, after having so recently voted to indorse and assume the payment of $15,000,000 of bonds to pay for paving the streets of this city, to pay attorneys for defending the officers of this Government, to pay newspapers for publishing reports of proceedings of investigations of officers of this Government, and to pay reporters for reporting those proceedings, vote to strike out this section. I think that would be an eminently proper thing for this Senate to do!

But, sir, I think that this Senate can afford, probably without ruining the Government, to make this appropriation of $20,000 to pay the expenses of the members of the convention to frame a constitution for the State of Colorado. I do not know that the Territory of Colorado is unable to pay these expenses. I do not think Colorado desires me or anybody else to present ourselves in the attitude of a beggar to ask the people of the country to pay the expenses of their conven-tion. But, sir, Colorado is just becoming of age. She is assuming the responsibility not only of self-government, but of bearing her equal fair share in the Government of us all; and I believe that ordinary prudent policy dictates that we should not receive her in a niggardly way. I do not believe that the $20,000 appropriated in this bill will be money illy spent.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not propose to say a word on this bill, but inasmuch as Territories are like orphans, to be taken care of by those who sit in the Senate and House, I desire in a very brief manner to present my views in reference to this appropriation.

on the question of economy, which question is raised nearly always in either branch of Congress where an appropriation may be objectionable to the views of some individuals, I do not think a good argument is presented in this instance. I agree, however, with the Senator from California in this respect, that when a State is coming into the Union it is a great boon presented to her to give her the privilege of the property of the control o doing so; but at the same time I maintain that it is equally as much a boon to the Government to have a State representation to take part and participate in the affairs of the nation, to become one helping and assisting in all ways to bear the burdens that are imposed upon the different States and the people thereof.

It is said that there is no precedent for this appropriation. There is a precedent for it in this, that heretofore, when the Territories have been organizing themselves into States in convention assembled for the purpose of making a constitution by and under which they will be governed, it has been usual to appropriate by Congress the amount of a fund, which may be a lapsed fund, perhaps, for the payment of the members of the convention who assembled for the purpose of forming a constitution. The application to the expenses of a convention of an amount of money which has lapsed or is over the amount appropriated to pay the legislative bodies and the judiciary of the Territory, is as much an appropriation to pay the convention as if it was appropriated directly out of the Treasury of the United

Then, when I say there is a precedent for it, I mean that when the money heretofore appropriated to a Territory over and above that which is needed for their incidental expenses is allowed by Congress to be applied for this purpose, it is such an act appropriating money as makes a precedent for appropriating any amount that may be necessary if the precedent is the thing we are to be governed by. There is no want of a precedent. What, then, can be the objection to the appropriation? It cannot be objected that it is not our duty to pay the expenses that are necessarily incurred for the purpose of organizing these people into a State. It is not objected that it is unfair or improper that that should be done. If it is not improper that that should proper that that should be done. If it is not improper that that should be done, why not do it, and appropriate the money out of the Treasury? There seems to be a kind of holy horror when the law that is to be enacted appropriates money out of the Treasury. I dislike to do that myself; but it is only whipping the devil around the stump when you apply funds heretofore appropriated—lapsed funds—instead of appropriating directly from the Treasury. There is no difference whatever; for, if it were not applied, the money would go back into the Treasury, and, if you extend the use of it, and allow it to be used for other purposes, it is as much an appropriation as if it were directly made in an appropriation bill.

I think this ought to be done. This Territory is coming in very soon as a new State. The people in the Territories are not able and capable of paying these expenses as the people of an old State. They generally go into a Territory poor, mostly young men, adventurers, for the purpose of making their fortunes. They settle themselves They settle themselves But while on this point down and grow up together with their State. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while this Territory has been in existence as a Territory it has paid into the national Treasury of the United States $1,400,000 of internal revenue. While they have paid into the Treasury of the United States $1,400,000 the expense of their territorial organization as taken from the Treasury of the United States has amounted only to the sum of $300,000. With this showing, (one that has not been made by any other Territory that has been organized into a State heretofore,) and with an amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States that is not commonly received from Territories prior to their organization as States-with this record it does seem to me that we ought not to hesthat the second is does seem to be that we dight not to hesitate to allow this amount for the purpose of paying this convention.

There is another point on this bill that I desire to call the attention of the Senate to. When we passed the act at the last session of Congress authorizing the Territory of Colorado to assemble in convention and form a State constitution, that they might be admitted as a State, we provided that persons who were lawful voters at the time of the passage of that act should be legal voters to vote for or against the adoption of the State constitution. By an examination of the laws of the Territory in reference to the right of suffrage, we find that a great many persons are in the Territory who were not voters at the time of the passage of that act, but who, under the laws of the Territory, will be voters at the time the constitution will be voted upon. Hence a great portion of the voters by this enactment have been deprived of the right to vote for or against the constitution. For instance, the governor of the Territory was not a voter at the time of the passage of that act, but he will be a voter under the laws of the Territory at the time appointed for voting on the ratification of the constitution. He is deprived by this act of the right to cast his vote for or against the constitution.

This bill has passed the House and come before the Senate; and I shall vote for it, believing as I do that it is our duty, at least to a certain extent, to encourage a young and growing Territory such as this is; I believe that, when properly developed by the hand of man, it will yield such revenues to the Government of the United States it will yield such revenues to the Government of the United States as will repay it for all the expenses, and much more too than the Government has been at in the organization of the Territory into a State. It is certainly a Territory that in its beginning has shown what its developments will be in the future; and with that development it will be such a State, and it will take its stand among the sister States in such a manner as not to be derogatory to the great Union ment it will be such a State, and it will take its stand among the sister-States in such a manner as not to be derogatory to the great Union in which it will soon take its place. I hope the Senate to-day will help it to get a fair start with the other States in the Union.

I trust, Mr. President, the bill will pass.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, if Colorado is so rich and pays such large revenues to the Government it certainly is not entitled to our sympathies. It is able to pay its own expenses, as every State admitted heretofore has done. I have before me a letter of Hon, R. W. Tayler, Comptroller of the Treasury, relating to the precedents in this matter, and I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk, and let us see if we are not asked to take a new departure here rather than to follow established precedents.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, Washington, D. C., January 15, 1876.

manington, D. C., January 15, 1876.

Mashington, D. C., January 15, 1876.

In reply to your reference to this Office of the House bill No. 355, making an appropriation of $20,000 for the expenses of the constitutional convention of Colorado, and requesting information as to the precedents, I would state that I have made a careful examination of the acts of Congress relating to like conventions, going back to 1836.

I find that in no case was any appropriation made to defray the costs incident thereto.

In the enabling act for Nebraska (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 50) the fourteenth section provided "that any unexpended balance of the appropriation for said territorial legislative expenses of Nebraska remaining for the fiscal years 1863 and 1864, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to, and used for, defraying the expenses of said convention." A like provision is contained in the Colorado enabling act under which this convention is held, approved March, 2 1875. 3, 1875. Very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER,

Hon. EUGENE HALE, House of Representatives.

Mr. SARGENT. It thus appears that there is no precedent what-Mr. SARGENT. It thus appears that there is no precedent whatever for the action proposed to-day; and the question is whether we will establish the precedent, which it is so easy to do and so difficult to avoid afterward. We established the precedent in the case of the State of Nebraska by allowing money which had been appropriated by the previous action of Congress, and perhaps by every principle of equity and of justice to the people should have gone back into the Treasury, to be used for this purpose. We made the same provision in the case of Colorado following that precedent, which I say it is so easy to do and so hard to depart from. This encourages demands of this kind. Now they come forward and coolly ask us take $20,000 out of the Treasury to pay these expenses, which ought never to be done. I hardly know what demand may be made upon us next in such cases, Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to put to the Senator a case. I do not know what the condition of Nebraska was at the time it was admit-ted, how much money was left over the expenditures necessary for the Legislature which was diverted to the expenses of the constitutional convention?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that there was more than $20,000 still to the credit of the Territory of Nebraska at that time.

Mr. LOGAN. If that be the case, I ask the Senator from California to state to the Senate, if he will, what the difference is between appropriating money out of the Treasury and appropriating the $20,000 in Nebraska that was in excess of their expenditures, which would have gone back into the Treasury had it not been allowed to be thus applied by that act.

Mr. SARGENT. So far as the Treasury is concerned, the effect would be the same; it would make no difference; but at the time Nebraska was admitted we had a very vicious system in several respects. One was that we allowed unexpended balances to run from year to year, the result of which was that in some of the Departments there were millresult of which was that in some of the Departments there were millions of money to the credit of an appropriation while we were required each year to appropriate as if there were no balance. In this way small sums were rolled up and carried by a system of book-keeping from year to year, so that if the appropriations were not up to what the Departments wished they fell back on these balances as they saw fit. I have no idea that it was called to the attention of members of Congress at the time that here were twenty or thirty thousand dollars affected by the provision. I have no doubt the idea was, "Well, we have appropriated twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars for legislative expenses; and after the Legislature gets through, if there is any of the money left, it may as well go to the expenses of this constitutional convention," and Congress good-naturedly said, "Yes, let that be done," supposing they were dealing with two, three, four, or five thousand dollars, but under no circumstances presuming that the amount could possibly go over $10,000. But by the system four, or five thousand dollars, but under no circumstances presuming that the amount could possibly go over $10,000. But by the system of balances of which I speak, which was the law at the time Nebraska was admitted, the other thing was possible. Therefore I do not think Congress ever intelligently appropriated twenty or more thousand dollars to defray the expenses of the constitutional convention of Nebraska. If it did, it certainly did not do right; it laid down one of those precedents which ought not to be followed. If a community which desires to be a State is not populous enough, is not stable enough, has not money enough to pay its expenses, it is not fit to be a State in the Union; it ought to be kept still longer in a condition of tutelage; it ought to be continued in the condition of a Territory, where we do not grudge paying the expenses of their territorial Legislature and judiciary and many of their expenses, and even make their roads for them and erect their public buildings. These things their roads for them and erect their public buildings. These things we do because they are weak or feeble; but there comes a time in their history when they knock at the doors of Congress and say, "We their history when they knock at the doors of Congress and say, "We are now strong; we have acquired a large population; we have stable and extended business; we are capable of being a full-fledged State; now admit us into the Union." One of the tests of the soundness of that prediction is, "Can you pay your bills? Can you even pay the very first bill which you will incur in coming into the Union, and that is for the expenses of the constitutional convention?" If they are not able to do that; if they say that they are too poor and too weak; that they are only young men, and few of them and poor, how can they bear the burden of a State administration? How can they after that pay the expenses of their State Legislature, of their governor, of their more expensive judiciary, all the expenses of constructing their public buildings, and works of that character? It is obvious they cannot do it. So my friend's argument, if it is of any value, would be an argument against the admission of Colorado at all. I think, however, he is correct in his other statement, that Colorado is really a strong, tax-paying community. I thought so, or I would not have voted for her to be admitted as a State. I believe she has those elements of wealth and stability which will enable her people to pay taxes to the Government of the United States to a very handsome amount, though not to a very extraordinary extent, and thus is a guarantee that they can pay the necessary expenses to get them into the Union, and support themselves hereafter.

I do not like to have precedents of this kind set. I know how these things grow up. First there is a little cloud no bigger than a man's hand; then it spreads over the whole heavens. A little item, apparently innocent, which we may not even investigate enough to fully understand, is allowed in an appropriation bill; next year the amount which is appropriated is doubled; after that, quadrupled; and finally it is the parent of a whole brood of just such cases, sometimes claims, sometimes schemes, which fasten themselves upon the civil service. I do not think it is worth while for us to set the example of paying the expenses of conventions, for the reason further that they are so often failures. Colorado has had several of these conventions already. Shall we pay the expenses of all those that have gone before? How often is it that a State constitution is rejected, or that the Territory is relegated to its previous condition. It has happened often in our history. I trust we shall not set this precedent, but that the amendment which I have moved will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust by unanimous consent we shall be allowed to dispose of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the continuance of this subject ?

Mr. ALLISON. I dislike to interfere with the Senator from Nebraska, but I think we ought to go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire, with the consent of the Senator from

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire, with the consent of the Senator from Iowa, to make a statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield for the present.

Mr. PADDOCK. I happened to be secretary of the then Territory of Nebraska at the time the convention, referred to by several Senators, was held, for which the appropriation was made. There had been no session of the Legislature during the preceding year. Therefore it occurred that there was quite a large sum of money in the Treasury, subject to the order of the secretary, for legislative expenses. This enabling act was passed for a convention to be held in penses. This enabling act was passed for a convention to be held in the latter part of the year 1864, s I now recollect. The delegates were elected to that convention, but the people had arrived at the conclusion before the election of delegates took place that they were not quite ready yet to form a State government; and so the delegates were generally elected under instructions from their constituents to adjourn the convention without taking any action whatever in the matter of framing a constitution for a State government. vention did so meet, and, after sitting one day, did so adjourn. No constitution was framed by that convention. Therefore no expense beyond that necessary to defray the session of one day was incurred under the act to which reference has been made. The constitution under which the State of Nebraska was admitted was framed by a committee of the Legislature two years later, and, having been submitted by a law passed by the Legislature for ratification by the people, was so ratified; and under that constitution we were admitted into the Union in 1866.

I deem it to be a duty that I owe to my State, after what has been said here, to make this statement. The framing of the constitution under which my State was admitted was not in any respect whatever a tax upon the Government either of the United States or of that of the then Territory of Nebraska. However, I believe it was right for the Government to offer to defray such expenses as was provided in the enabling act of 1864. I believe it is right and proper in this case. If Colorado should be admitted under the constitution which is being prepared by the convention now in session, the saving per annum to the Government will be in the neighborhood of $50,000. With the understanding that has been had by the people of the Territory of Colorado that such expenses were to be defrayed as provided in the Colorado that such expenses were to be defrayed as provided in the enabling act, my impression is that it will be considered by the people there to have been a sort of trick if they are finally saddled with the expense of the convention after all; and it is barely possible that that very omission on the part of the Government may defeat altogether the admission of that State through the rejection of the constitution by the people. I understand that there is a party there opposed in any event to the admission of the State. I believe it is best that the State should be admitted. Every motive of economy, I think, points in that direction, and therefore I shall vote for this bill as it is. I believe it to be emigently proper that the Government under points in that direction, and therefore I shall vote for this bill as it is. I believe it to be eminently proper that the Government, under such circumstances, should pay the expenses of the first convention which frames a constitution under which a new State is to be admitted into the Union. I hope, sir, that the amendment of the Senator from California may not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senator the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senate will allow this Colorado bill to be voted upon. I think it will take but a few minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. If the bill is to be voted on now I shall not object, but if it is to take up any time I shall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection is made, and the Colorado bill is continued before the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not detain the Senate except to state the case. If I understand it, this is a discrimination now made for the first time in favor of the admission of Colorado, that there is no pree-edent except the precedent of Nebraska of an appropriation made by the Congress of the United States to pay the expenses of a consti-States have come into the Union without Congress being called upon to pay the expenses of their forming their State government in their own way. If the proposition made by the Senator from California was a discrimination against Colorado I should not vote for it, because I would extend to Colorado every advantage, facility, or convenience that has been given to any State ever admitted into the Union, for I believe it will be one of the most prosperous and wealthy States of the Union before many years roll around.

But, sir, if there is no precedent for this appropriation, we ought But, sir, if there is no precedent for this appropriation, we ought not now to make one. That is very clear. Because we are reducing the expenses in other departments of the Government, it is illogical and improper for us now to make new examples of appropriations which have not occurred before. If from the time Ohio was admitted to this hour, during which time from twenty to twenty-five States have been admitted into the Union, no such thing has been done, this is not the first time to enter on the experiment. Nor is the case of Nebraska in point because there an appropriation usually made for the Legislative Assembly, if any was unexpended, was allowed to be expended to aid in paying the expenses of the constitutional convention. That is not the case now presented.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator state the distinction between appropriating money that is unexpended and appropriating money from the Treasury directly?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that that example was wrongly set in

Mr. LOGAN. I am not speaking of that. I am asking whether there is any distinction between appropriating unexpended balances and appropriating money directly from the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. Here is the case as the Senator from Illinois puts it. Congress, contrary to previous precedents, undertook to help somewhat the people of Nebraska to pay the expenses of their constitutional convention. They did it in an unhappy way, a way that ought never to have been resorted to, by indirection; and now because they did that wrongly, by indirection, it is proposed that we shall do directly what they ought not to have done. That is not

I appeal to Senators that although this is but $20,000 and it is not much to the Government of the United States, yet it is establishing a precedent which we ought not now to establish. The people of Colorado are abundantly able to pay the expenses of the delegates who assemble to form their own constitution. It is not a fit subject of national expenditure. It is not within the province of Congress to pay the people of the States either to frame their constitutions or to frame their laws. We have no more right nor is it any more our duty to appropriate money to pay them for framing their constitutions than it is to appropriate money to enable the people of New York to pay their expensive Legislature. The object is not within the scope and compass of national expenditure. Therefore it ought not now to be entered upon, although the amount is small.

not now to be entered upon, although the amount is small.

With the kindest feelings for the people of Colorado and with every desire to see them prosperous, and I know they will be prosperous in the very speedy future, I certainly will vote against this appropriation, because it is an appropriation without example, not founded on any correct principle; it is not for the support of proper expenditures of the Government of the United States. We ought not to be called upon to pay either the initiative or any other expenses of the State government. The people of Colorado are abundantly able to do it themselves.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if I understand the facts correctly, it will be setting no new precedent whatever if this section shall be it will be setting no new precedent whatever if this section shall be retained in the bill. I may be misinformed, but I think I am not. Congress has always borne the expense of the territorial government and has always made appropriations, and left the expenditure of those appropriations in a great degree to the discretion of the territorial Legislature; and I have no doubt that if those expenditures could be looked into in the States that have been admitted into the Union, it would be found that the Legislatures have uniformly used any balance in their treasury of congressional appropriations to pay the expenses of their constitutional conventions if it became necessary to

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, I will read him an official report on that subject.

Mr. THURMAN. An official report of what?

Mr. SHERMAN. The official report of Mr. Tayler, showing that no constitutional conventions have had their expenses paid from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. I will hear it.
Mr. SHERMAN. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, Washington, D. C., January 15, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your reference to this Office of the "House bill No. 355, making an appropriation of $20,000 for the expenses of the constitutional convention of Colorado" and requesting information as to the precedents, I would state that I have made a careful examination of the acts of Congress relating to like conventions, going back to 1836.

I find that in no case was any appropriation made to defray the costs incident thereto.

Mr. THURMAN. I have not the least doubt about that. Mr. SHERMAN. The letter goes on:

In the enabling act for Nebraska (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 50) the fourteenth section provided "that any unexpended balance of the appropriation for said territorial legislative expenses of Nebraska remaining for the fiscal years 1863 and 1864, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to, and used for, defraying the expenses of said convention." A like provision is contained in the Colorado enabling act under which this convention is held, approved March

3, 1875. Very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER, Comptroller.

Hon. EUGENE HALE, House of Hepresentatives.

So that we have already applied to Colorado the example set in the case of Nebraska.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say, nor do I suppose I should be correct in saying, that Congress has been accustomed to appropriate specifically for the payment of the expenses of a constitutional convention in a Territory; but what I said, and what I believe will be found to be true, and what is in nowise contradicted by the statement of the First Comptroller, is that it has been customary, out of the appropriations made by Congress and subject to the discretion of the territorial Legislature as to the objects of their expenditure, to employ any part of those appropriations if the territorial Legislature saw fit to employ for defraying the expenses of their constitutional conventions

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the very rules under which moneys are drawn out of the Treasury exclude the conclusion at which he arrives. Congress appropriates money for the Territories, as it does for the consular and diplomatic service, so much for specific purposes; for instance, so much for legislative expenses at a certain session of the Legislature. Not a dollar of that amount goes into the hands of the territorial officers, except by vouchers which they make up and send to the Department, which are examined and the amounts thereof paid. If the money was to be used for a constitutional convention, or a town meeting, or a party convention, instead of legislative expenses. town meeting, or a party convention, instead of registative expenses, it could not be drawn for any such purpose. So in reference to all the other expenses; we appropriate so much for rent of a building for the use of the Legislature, so much for fuel, so much for lighting. No money can be drawn except for those specific purposes; and, if appropriated for the lighting of buildings occupied by the territorial propriated for the lighting of buildings occupied by the territorial officers, it cannot be used to pay for lighting up a building which is used by a constitutional convention.

Mr. THURMAN. That may be very true where the appropriation bill is so specific that it would be impossible to use the money for any other purpose; but it will be found, I imagine, that there have been general appropriations for the expenses of all Territories that could be thus applied. At least I am so advised, and I think there is no doubt about the fact.

But six proporprinciple is not this the act of the people of that Territories.

But, sir, upon principle, is not this the act of the people of that Territory while they are still in a territorial condition and still subject to the jurisdiction of Congress? May we not reject their constitution? It is true we have provided that, if they adopt a constitution, and the President announces it, Coloradoshall be a State; but, to test the prin-President announces it, Coloradoshall be a State; but, to test the principle, might we not reject the constitution adopted by the Territory if it was not, in the opinion of Congress, republican in form or in pursuance of the enabling act? Undoubtedly so. This act is done by the people while they are still in a territorial condition, still subject to our revision. We could repeal the enabling act to-morrow if we saw fit to do so. The same principle, therefore, that requires us to pay the expenses of these people while they are in a territorial condition in respect to other matters justifies us in paying these expenses too. In other words, they do not become self-supporting until they become a State in the Union. Up to that time they are the wards of become a State in the Union. Up to that time they are the wards of this Government, and the Government properly pays the expenses. I shall vote to retain the section in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. Sargent] to strike out the second section, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 34; as follows:

NAYS-Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Conover, Eaton, English, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Johnston, McCreery, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Sherman, West, and Withers—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Dawes, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Nevada, Key, Mitchell, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Windom—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is now be-

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to insert after line 10 the following item:

For additional pay of professors for length of service, $6,800.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was after line 12 to insert the following clause:

Mr. ALLISON. Section 1336 of the Revised Statutes provides

The instructors of ordnance and science of gunnery, and of practical engineering, shall have the pay and allowaxces of major; and hereafter there shall be allowed and paid to the said professors 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years' service in the Army and at the academy.

An officer of the rank of lieutenant may be assigned to this duty of instructor of military engineering. If so, under this law he is enti-

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me it is hardly wise to invite such details. It increases the pay of the Army just so much, and rather gives a bonus indirectly for assigning to that duty a lieutenant instead of a

Mr. ALLISON. That has been the law, nearly from the beginning of the organization of the Military Academy, that the instructors receive the pay of a higher rank at times than they would be authorized to receive if they were in the military service proper, thus opening the entire Army to be assigned to these duties at West Point. That is all there is of it.

Mr. HOWE. I must be allowed to say, for one, that I do not see the sense of that; I do not see the wisdom of it. It is saying that the service of a professor at West Point is more arduous or more meritorious. or for some reason or other should carry with it a larger compensation, than the service of the same individual on the frontiers or actual war, which does not seem to me to be proper.

Mr. ALLISON. I refer the Senator from Wisconsin to the Military Committee. That law perhaps might be amended, but that is the law at present, and we know no other way than to make the proper ap-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton. Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Key, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Wallace, West, Windom, and Withers—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, English, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Kernan. McDonald, Merrimon, and Whyte—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Clayton, Drwes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 15 the following item:

For pay of one instructor of ordnance and science of gunnery, in addition to pay as first lieutenant, $900.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that all these amendments stand on precisely the same footing; they provide for pay in accordance with section 1336 of the Revised Statutes and other laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All these amendments will then be ported and considered together.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is also proposed to insert the following: For pay of eight assistant professors, in addition to pay as first lieutenants, $4,000.

$4,000.

For pay of three instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics, in addition to pay as first lieutenants, $1,500.

For pay of four assistant instructors of tactics, commanding companies, in addition to pay as second lieutenants, $2,400.

For pay of adjutant, in addition to pay as first lieutenant, $300.

Mr. EATON. I should like to know from some member of the committee the reason why these amendments, which are to be voted upon in gross, are proposed?

Mr. ALLISON. I will state in reply to the Senator from Connecticut that the law provides that these assistant professors and instructors shall each receive the pay of a major; but an officer of lower rank, such as captain or first lieutenant, may be assigned by the Secretary of War or by the President to perform these duties. In case such officer is so assigned, he receives the pay of the rank provided for by law, namely, the rank of major. That is all there is of it. If a major is assigned to this duty, he receives no additional pay. If a captain is assigned to the duty, he receives the pay of his co-pro-

Mr. EATON. In other words, if a professor at West Point is unable by health or by age to perform the duties devolving upon him, and a second lieutenant or a first lieutenant is sent to perform his duties, then the pay is to be increased. I suppose that is the sum and substance of the whole matter.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is entirely wrong in his proposition. There are but nine professors at West Point by law, but there are thirty-eight officers of the Army assigned to duty there, and when they assume duty there as assistants to the professors, they are allowed this extra compensation. They do not take the place of the other professors at all. Mr. EATON. I do not know about that. I am not at all satisfied with the explanation of the honorable Senator from Louisiana. know something about the manner in which these appointments are given out. I do not know that it will do any good for any Senator to say a word upon this question, but I desire to say this much: I think that the people demand retrenchment in every branch of the service. There are to-day in the city of New York alone fifty thouservice. There are to-day in the city of New York alone fifty thousand men and women out of employment, asking alms, supported by charity. There are in my own city of fifty thousand people more than fifteen hundred persons supported to-day by charity. The people of the United States demand retrenchment in every branch of the expenditures of the Federal Government. For one Senator, I shall do what I believe to be my duty, and other Senators will do what they believe to be their duty, doubtless. These expenditures, some Senator observed on Friday were small. Six dropt of water are small, but believe to be their duty, doubtless. These expenditures, some Senator observed on Friday, were small. Sir, drops of water are small, but they make a full glass of water. Drops of water are small, but agglomerated, they constitute rills, rills make creeks, creeks make rivers on which the commerce of the world can ride in safety. begin to cut down here, and wherever we can retrench, retrench.

It will not do any good, so far as I am concerned, to make heroic speeches on this floor. I have as high a regard for the institution at West Point as it deserves; no higher regard for that institution than I have for the institution of learning in my own State, Yale, and for Harvard in Massachusetts. The very distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] on Friday said that these men were his peers, and he knew no reason why they should not receive $5,000 a year, if he received $5,000 a year. Sir, I am not his judge. If any Senator on this floor chooses to illustrate by himself, that is his business, not mine. When the proper time comes, if it is deemed advisable to cut down the salaries of Senators of the United States, I shall not be found wanting in doing my duty. I am on this thing now. I take the thing before me and act upon this. When any other matters comes up here, I will act upon them as I deem to be just and right. I should like some gentleman to tell me how many professors and assistant professors and teachers and assistant teachers there are in this institution at West Point?

Mr. ALLISON. I can tell the Senator.

Mr. EATON. I will yield with pleasure.
Mr. ALLISON. By an examination of the estimates, if the Senator will turn to them, he will see that there are two assistant instructors with the rank of major; eight assistant professors with the rank of captain; three instructors with the rank of captain; and four assistant instructors with the rank of captain. That comprises the whole

Mr. EATON. I did not have an opportunity to count them up, my friend spoke so rapidly. If he can tell me the whole number, I shall be obliged to him.
Mr. ALLISON. Seventeen.

Mr. EATON. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to say there Mr. LOGAN. Detailed officers altogether.
Mr. WEST. There are seventeen who get extra pay, but there are altogether thirty-seven officers on duty there.

are called, would be ranked in a civil institution by what are called tutors. For instance, there are so many professors in Columbia, or Harvard, or Yale; then come tutors; and I suppose these gentlemen would rank with those. You more than double their pay. Is this right? I understood the distinguished Senator from Illinois to say the other day that he had very little regard for the opinion of any lawyer who would say that a bill of this character could be passed. I undertake to say to the Senate and to the honorable Senator from Illinois that the question of law need not be made to-day on this mat-

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state to him what I did say. He certainly has stated what I did not say. I said that I would have little regard for the opinion of a lawyer who would say would have little regard for the opinion of a lawyer who would say you could reduce a salary in an appropriation bill without first repealing the law fixing the salary. I said that; I say so now.

Mr. EATON. Well, sir, I shall stand in the category, then, of being regarded as a very poor lawyer by my distinguished friend from Illinois, for I say it can be done. I say it as a lawyer. I say there is no sort of trouble at all about reducing a salary in an appropriation bill before you alter your law.

bill before you alter your law.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator this question, then, as a law-yer: If you reduce it in your appropriation bill without repealing the statute, does not the claim against the Government stand the same as it did prior to the passage of your appropriation bill?

Mr. EATON. The honorable Senator from Illinois has put himself on a different plank now. He just remarked that this could not be done until after the law was repealed, and I beg leave to differ in that

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is certainly very technical. I do not mean to say that you cannot put in a provision of a certain character and follow it with another repealing the former act; but I mean to say that it cannot become a law so as to exclude the right of a person from his pay without a repealing clause repealing the law that gives him the salary. I supposed the Senator understood that to be my

Mr. EATON. I now understand the exact meaning of the Senator from Illinois.

That is what I did say before.

Mr. EATON. It will be time enough to answer that question by and by; it is not necessary to answer it now. It is sufficient for me that the Senate has the power now to agree with the other branch in passing this bill as it was. It will be time enough by and by to determine whether another clause is necessary to be added to the bill.

Mr. President, I propose to be found on the side of retrenchment in everything where I properly may be, where injustice is not done; but no arguments have been shown here, no reason has been adduced satisfying me why these salaries should be kept up. The only reason urged is that it is in accordance with the law; not that an assistant professor at West Point should receive a higher salary than a professor at Yale or Harvard, but simply that the law is so. Let us to-day, so far as we can, alter it. Let us make the appropriation less, and hereafter we can take care of the law. Let us now make the appropriation what it properly should be. I shall vote for no one thing connected with this or any other appropriation bill that may come up here that does not look to retrenchment and reform. The people demand it. They have a right to demand it. The monetary condition of the country demands it at our hands; and we ought to look it square in the face. We know the misery there is to-day all over this broad land in every town and hamlet. People are out of employment; spindles are not whirling; industry is prostrated; and yet nothing is to be done by the Senate of the United States in reducing the taxation to be done by the Senate of the United States in reducing the taxation of the people!

Mr. President, I hope that we shall think better of this. I hope that the majority of this House—I do not speak of the Senate, I do not speak of the majority now on the other side of the House; I speak of the majority in numbers—I hope that a majority of this Senate will go with a majority of the other branch of the Federal Legislature, and, so far as possible, let us cut down the expenses of the Federal Government. They are too large. I agree that these items are small. I agree that in the aggregate they are but a few thousand dollars; but they are upon the first bill. The question is before us, and we have got to meet it. Perhaps I should have preferred that some other bill should have come here first rather than this bill. Perhaps I rebill should have come here first rather than this bill. Perhaps I regret to be obliged to cut down these expenses more than I would some other expenses touching the Federal service; but I am compelled to meet the question on this bill, as it is here first. Therefore I propose to vote against every one of the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I dislike to trouble the Senate, but I think a very few words can explain—especially to the Senator from Connecticut, if he will give me his attention—the reason why the assistant professors of ordnance and gunnery and practical engineering have fixed to their pay over and above the pay proper of a lieutenant in the Army. The Senator says that in the institution in his State, to wit, Yale, they pay so much. I venture the assertion that there is not a professor in Yale college qualified to teach the science of ordnance and gunnery. Ordnance, gunnery, and practical engineering are scientific branches taught at West Point. You may teach practical engineering at Yale, but certainly, I think, not the science of ordnance The ordnance and engineer departments are scientific and gunnery. departments of the Army, and men are assigned to them because of their higher education, if I may so term it, in that which is necessary in carrying out the things connected with and pertaining to warfare. For instance, men in the ordnance department must understand the composition of the materials that are used necessary for providing the artillery, the musket, the shell, the strength of powder, the strength of the iron, the character of fuse, and everything of that kind. The science of using gunnery after it is put into shape is a scientific teaching, then; and that is the reason why the assistant professor who teaches the science of ordnance and gunnery receives higher pay. suppose a man would be considered not very well versed in matters pertaining to warfare if he should detail a first lieutenant of infantry who had never studied the science of gunnery and ordnance as an assistant professor in the ordnance department at West Point. I supsistant processor in the ordinance department at West Foint. I suppose he would be a very strange man if he should detail some one who understood but little about practical engineering to West Point to teach practical engineering to the class. It is well known that upon the graduation of these young men they take their places in the Army accordingly. Some graduate in the ordinance, some in the engineering department; others in the infantry and cavalry, and they are assigned according to their graduation to the different branches in the Army. For that reason a man is detailed for the purpose of teaching Army. For that reason a man is detailed for the purpose of teaching these scientific branches pertaining to warfare. They are expected to be men well versed, well taught, scientific men, too, well trained practically; and therefore they are better qualified to teach these branches there than other men. They have made themselves qualified; they have studied; they have thoroughly prepared themselves, have devoted all the time perhaps that they had to spare in making preparations so that they may stand toward the head in the branch to which they belong. They are detailed on that account, and therefore they are naid a higher salary than if they were not prepared for their duties.

they belong. They are detailed on that account, and therefore they are paid a higher safary than if they were not prepared for their duties. Not only that, but when they are detailed to West Point for the duties there, the duties are very different from what they are in the Army. The duties at West Point are continuous. All the time experiments are going on in gunnery, in ordnance, and on this account, men being kept constantly employed in experimenting and teaching these students, they are allowed $900 more than what? More than the pay of a first lieutenant. That is, in other words, they are entitled to the nav of a major in the Army. If they are majors in the the pay of a first lieutenant. That is, in other words, they are entitled to the pay of a major in the Army. If they are majors in the Army they receive $2,500 as professors at West Point. With the assimilated rank of a major they receive $2,500. That is their pay and this pay is allowed to them by law. The $900 is added to the pay of a first lieutenant in order to make the pay of a major in the Army; and that is the reason of it. I do not think they receive any too much. That is the point in this amendment. It is not as to whether professors at Yale receive this or that sum; it is not as to whether reconcerving is the consideration which should contral us; it is not as economy is the consideration which should control us; it is not as to whether the spindles are silent in New England or the hammers in Pennsylvania; but the question is, is the compensation too much? I say it is not. There is not a scientific man in the engineering or ordnance departments of the Army who could not receive more pay outside, in my judgment, than he receives at West Point, if it were not that it is a life-time position. These men are detailed there with the that it is a life-time position. These men are detailed there with the pay of a major. That which they have to do it is not necessary for us to talk about here. It is not necessary to speak of the many things that are required of officers at West Point which are not required of officers elsewhere. It is not necessary to suggest this to the Senator from Connecticut. He is certainly a man who will state that which he believes to be correct and proper, and he knows, his long experience teaches him, that when these men are located there they are subjected to many expenses that they would not incur if they were here in the Ordnance Department, or somewhere else at some of the places where the ordnance of the Government is provided, and stationed to take care of arsenals, or of some of the arms of the Government. He knows that very well; and this additional pay is given to encourage men who are well up in the science of these branches to be willing to go there and teach them to the students. It is because of the other expenses to which they themselves are incident, which they must incur on account of their location there, in connection with the Military Academy, that this allowance is made; and in my judgment it is very properly made.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word or two in explanation of the vote which I expect to give on the pending proposition. If I were called upon to consider as an original question the amount of pay to be received by these professors, I think it would be found that I would go as far as the farthest in the direction of economy; with a proper regard, however, to efficiency in the service which was to be performed; but I look upon this question as having passed far beyond that point. Economically disposed as we may all be, however firm our determination may be to cut down the expenditures of the Government and relieve the wide-pervading poverty and distress through the country by reducing its expenses to the lowest possible ebb, I think in this particular case we find ourselves—at least I find myself—confronted by a distinct provision of the law; and as long as that stands upon the statute-book, I do not care how and as long as that stands upon the statute-book, I do not care now strongly we may vote negatively upon these appropriations, the effect of a negative is not to save one dollar to the Treasury. We may refuse the appropriation; but I believe it has been stated, and not contradicted by any lawyer on this floor, that the gentlemen who fill these positions could come before us hereafter with claims for the compensation to which they are entitled under the provisions on the statute-book, and that any court would allow them that additional compensation. If that be true, and it has not yet been denied, it seems to me that we cannot legislate now, in deference to any possible repeal of the existing law which allows them this compensation. We are bound to cast our votes in accordance with the law as it stands, and the law as it stands gives the additional compensation which is provided for in the amendments which have been reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Therefore, for one, I feel constrained, notwithstanding my intense

Therefore, for one, I feel constrained, notwithstanding my intense desire to economize, to vote for that appropriation to which these parties are entitled under the law.

Mr. EATON. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan] has informed the Senate that these professors are placed at West Point because of their peculiar knowledge in certain departments. I have no doubt about that. Men are placed everywhere in all institutions of learning, whether a civil or a military college, because of their supposed ability to teach. Now let us go back to the beginning of the life of one of the gentlemen who occupies the position of instructor in ordnance and the science of gunnery at West Point. Educated by the United States, supported by the money of the people, given a course of education at that very institution where he is now a professor or an assistant professor, he acquired his information now a professor or an assistant professor, he acquired his information on a little different stand from an individual who occupies a like position at Yale or Harvard. The latter pays his own expenses. That boy commences reading, goes into college, and pays his own expenses at the university. It is not so with the West Point professor. He is given so much a year for the acquisition of this very information. I have yet to learn—I may learn it, but I have yet to learn—that the man who understands the science of gunnery ought to receive a larger salary than the man who is professor of mental philosophy, or the man who occupies a high position in one of our civil institutions of learning. I say I have yet to learn that fact; I have not yet learned

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator this question: Why is it that a cavalry officer in the Army receives more pay than an infantry officer? Why is it that an ordnance officer receives more pay than an infantry officer? Does not the Senator understand that to be the

Mr. EATON. I understand that a cavalryman has a nag that he rides, and it costs more to support that animal than it does to ride on what is called "Shank's horse." So I suppose additional pay is given to a cavalry officer.

Mr. LOGAN.

The Senator is entirely mistaken. Very likely, sir. The Government furnishes the food for the animal Mr. EATON. Mr. LOGAN. and for the man too; but the cavalry officer receives more pay proper than an officer in the infantry arm of the service. The officer may furnish his own horse, but the food for that horse is furnished by the Government; and yet he receives more pay proper. An ordnance officer, who is stationed here or elsewhere, receives more pay than an infantry officer because it is considered a higher branch of the service. The ordnance, the engineering, and the gunnery departments are considered the three high branches of the Army because they are scientific corps, and they receive higher pay than the infantry branch of

Mr. EATON. I am not learned in these matters, and I am too old to learn very much about them, and too old to care very much about them.

Mr. LOGAN. That may be possible.
Mr. EATON. If it is deemed advisable that a cavalry officer in the service should receive more pay than an infantry officer, doubtless it is for some good reason. We are not now talking about that, and I am not now caring about that. I am looking at these professors at West Point, and I say that they ought not to receive more wages than West Point, and I say that they ought not to receive more wages than men of high standing in other institutions of learning. Are they greater than other men? Are they men of greater power and greater mental force than other men who are at the head of Yale and Harvard and Columbia and Princeton? Are they doing more for the weal of the world, for this country of ours? I say, no; it is not true, as a matter of fact, that a professor at West Point is doing any more, for he is not doing any more for the young men of the United States than a professor at Harvard or at Yale—men who have in their hands the youth of the country upon whose heads will fall within the coming youth of the country upon whose heads will fall, within the coming twenty years, the destinies of this great people. I wish to say nothing here against the Army or West Point officers. Many of them are my strong personal friends; but I should do violence to my own sense of justice and right if I did not oppose these amendments, not because they are military men, but because the wants of the country demand retrenchment here as elsewhere; and if it be so that we are not to retrench here, are we to do so anywhere? I shall vote against all of these amendments to this appropriation bill.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, in my opinion there is but one limit to the subject of retrenchment; and it is the necessities of the public service. Consistent with that vital essential I will be found with my brother from Connecticut in retrenchment at every point. I regard this as an essential in the public service, and I cannot vote to reduce the pay of these officers to a point below that which the corresponding rank in the Army receives until the pay of that corresponding rank in the Army shall also be reduced.

It is said that this is a new policy. It is as old as the Military Academy itself. It commenced with the inception of the Military Academy and has grown up with it.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. If I am correctly informed—and I get my information from him who is most likely to give it, indirectly from the Secretary of War—I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if this longevity pay, which alone is now sought to be repealed, was not for the first time given to the professors at West Point in 1870, and, further, whether this same provision for longevity pay was not and, further, whether this same provision for longevity pay was not put upon an appropriation bill and continued by the act making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point approved the 20th of February, 1873?

Mr. WALLACE. That may be entirely correct. That question is not before us, but has been passed upon by a vote taken in the Senate this morning. This is simply a question as to whether we will appropriate that which the law requires us to appropriate, the pay of a major or the pay of a captain or the pay of a lieutenant who is in service at West Point under the assignment of the President. That, I say, is part of the policy of Congress, and is as old as the Military Academy itself, initiated in 1812, repeated in 1838, again repeated in 1851, again in 1852, and in 1857. I ask the Clerk to read section 2 of the act of 1812 upon this subject. It seems to be conclusive.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Military Academy shall consist of the corps of engineers and the following professors, in addition to the teachers of the French language and drawing already provided, namely: one professor of natural and experimental philosophy, with the pay and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel, if not an officer of the corps, and if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a lieutenant-colonel; one professor of mathematics, with the pay and emoluments of a major; if not an officer of the corps, and if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a major; one professor of the art of engineering in all its branches, with the pay and emoluments of a major; in not an officer of the corps, and if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a major; each of the foregoing professors to have an assistant professor, which assistant professor shall be taken from the most prominent characters of the officers or cadets, and receive the pay and emoluments of captains, and no other pay or emoluments while performing these duties: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall entitle the academical staff, as such, to any command in the Army separate from the academy.

Mr. WALLACE: That is the very policy which has continued ever

Mr. WALLACE. That is the very policy which has continued ever Mr. WALLACE. That is the very policy which has continued ever since that time, and it is the policy of this appropriation bill as reported by the Senate committee. In other words, we aver that the statutes give to a first lieutenant assigned to duty as an assistant professor of West Point the pay of a major; and until that policy shall have been changed by calm consideration and determination in the Senate on the subject itself, it is our bounden duty to make the appropriation as we find the statute. This is the consideration that controls me. If the policy that was initiated in 1812 and has been followed again and again until this hour is to be repealed without consideration, and repealed too at the expense of the general consideration going to the very bottom of the Army organization, it seems to me it would be highly improper. I say until we consider this policy deliberately upon the question of reducing the pay of the whole footing of the Army we ought not to interfere with these pro-

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire, Mr. President, briefly to state how this question is practically presented by the House bill to the Senate. The professors at West Point were originally regarded as active officers of the Army. By the act of April 23, 1856, section 1333 of the Revised Statutes, page 227, they were placed upon the same footing as officers of the Army retired from active duty. Why should we do more for these professors than for retired officers of the Army? We know that these professors than for retired officers of the Army? We know that many of the brave men who are now placed annually upon the retired list have consecrated a life-time to the military service of their country. They have faced the perils of war and endured every species of hardship and privation of the camp; many of them maimed and wounded in the defense of their country; their health enfeebled and their constitutions impaired, you retire them in advanced life at only three-fourths of their pay. But to the nine professors of the academy at West Point you propose to give them $3,500 and $3,000 per annum and furnish them with houses, fuel, medical attendance, and schools for their children. Why such a discrimination? Is it just? Is it equitable? Is it equitable?

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator, if I do not interrupt him, again read the section that he is quoting from !

Mr. STEVENSON. Section 1333 of the Revised Statutes, page 227: The professors of the Military Academy at West Point are placed on the same footing, as to retirement from active service, as officers of the Army.

Mr. WEST. Again let me ask, what does the Senator construe that

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will allow me to go on without constant interruption. When I conclude my reme to go on without constant interruption. When I conclude my remarks on this point I will cheerfully answer any questions he may propound. I insist, then, that the act I have cited puts the professors at West Point on the same footing with officers who have been placed on the retired list. I think it unjust to discriminate in the compensation between retired officers and these professors. Can there be any doubt of the equity of my proposition? If so, let the advocates of increased compensation to these professors over the retired officers of the Army point it out. Either retire the officers of the Army on full pay, or strike out the increased longevity pay of the professors at the Military Academy. I understand, although I may be misinformed, that officers of the Army are retired on three-fourths of their pay as due them under their rank at the period of their retiretheir pay as due them under their rank at the period of their retire-

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I understand that the professors at West Point are retired precisely as Army officers are retired, upon three-fourths pay and not upon full

Mr. STEVENSON. That is what ought to be the rule equitably. But you increase the compensation of the professors by longevity pay, which the House bill repealed, but which it is now proposed to be restored.

Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. STEVENSON. But I understand that these professors at West Point do not retire on their three-quarters pay.

Mr. WEST. On full pay.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me understand the exact facts, because I want to be informed; I seek information. I am informed that the longevity pay of the professors at West Point is the only item of complexity pay of the House hill. I understand further that this pensation repealed by the House bill. I understand further that this longevity pay is an increased compensation to these professors, put on an appropriation bill which I now hold in my hand making appropriations for the support of the Army, ending the 30th of June, 1871. This longevity pay was increased by an amendment on the appropriation bill making appropriation for the Military Academy, ending 30th June, 1874. There was no objection to this increased compensation of these professors upon an appropriation bill at that time. If there was, I do not see it in the debate. At that time it was entirely leading to the property of the pay of t legitimate to increase the pay on an appropriation bill. But when it is now proposed to repeal the item of longevity pay on an appropriation bill, we are met with the objection that the Senate should not in appropriation bills interfere with existing legislation. Why was not this objection interposed when this increased pay was put on the Military Academy appropriation bill? The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan] put the question to me on Friday last whether I as a lawyer believed Congress had the power to reduce salaries on appropriation bills. I examined the files of the Senate and I have obtained the original bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1874; and upon that military bill was ingrafted this provision:

For additional pay of officers, and for pay of instructors, professors, cadets, and musicians, $223,379.50: Provided, That the professors of the United States Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel; and the instructors of ordnance and science of gunnery and of practical engineering shall have the pay and allowances of majer; and hereafter there shall be allowed and paid to the said professors 10 per cent of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years' service in the Army and at the academy: Provided. That such addition shall in no case exceed 40 per cent of said yearly pay; and said professors are hereby placed upon the same footing as regards restrictions upon pay and retirement from active service as officers of the Army.

If the Senate had power to increase the compensation of these professors on a bill making appropriations for the Military Academy, why have we not the right to reduce the compensation by a provision in a

Mr. STEVENSON. I always yield to my friend from Illinois with pleasure

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wished to call the Senator's attention to the point we were discussing, which was not that the Senate and House did not have the power to do it; that was not the question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I remember the Senator's question, but I am replying now to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] who questioned not only the policy but the right of the Senate to do it. He said the Senate might do it as an act of absolute legislative power, but that its exercise would be anomalous, extraordinary, against power, but that its exercise would be anomalous, extraordinary, against all precedent. I will reply presently to the objection of the Senator from Illinois. Let me here repeat to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] and to other Senators who have agreed with him, that this item of longevity pay of these professors at West Point was put on, I think, for the first time in 1870, and that it was increased by a provision in the West Point appropriation bill approved 30th of June 1874. The House bill which was are now considering. 30th of June, 1874. The House bill which we are now considering proposes to repeal only this increased longevity pay. I think if we intend to retrench the expenditures of the Government it is a proper reduction. Congress pursues the same policy as to the retired officers of the Army. These brave men are only allowed three-fourths of their pay, without fuel and lights or any other extras. Why should we discriminate against them in favor of the professors at West Point?

I confess I have heard no argument which tends to persuade me that the reduction proposed by the House in repealing this longevity pay to the professors at West Point is unwise, illiberal, or unjust in view of the retrenchment demanded by the present stringency of the view of the retrenement demanded by the present stringency of the times. During the discussion in the Senate on Friday last the Senator from New Jersey asked me the question if I knew of a precedent reducing salaries on appropriation bills. He said he did not believe a precedent could be found where an amendment which interfered with existing legislation had been put on an appropriation bill. was surprised at the question of the Senator at the time. I replied that I was satisfied there were many precedents, but he seemed incredulous of the existence of one. The Senator argued that such a practice was a most dangerous species of legislation. I have never in the main favored such legislation; I think the Senator from New Jersey has. I propose to turn to the record now and show who has in the past advocated incongruous and irrelevant legislation upon appropriation bills; provisions which directly interfered with existing legislation. We had before us on the 7th of June, 1873, a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1873, and for other purposes. Senator Kellogg, now governor of Louisiana, proposed to amend that appropriation bill by the following amendment:

appropriation bill by the following amendment:

The said act being hereby supplemented and amended so as to strike out from section 2 the words "having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants," and the words "city or town," wherever the same occur therein, and insert instead of the words "city or town" the words "county or parish;" and in the same section, after the words "shall be," and before the words "their desire to have said registration," insert the words "or to any district judge in said circuit by him designated, who shall, for the purposes of this act, have the powers of the circuit judge." And thereafter, in the same section, strike out the word "circuit," wherever the same occurs, before the word "court" or before the word "judge." Also, insert after the words "supervisors of election" the words "who shall serve without compensation, unless appointed in cities and towns of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward."

Mark you sir! There was an election be

Mark you, sir! There was an election law, a proposed change in the judges, times, mode, and manner of conducting an election in the State of Louisiana, incorporated upon a standing appropriation bill from the House by this incongruous amendment in the Senate.

Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, raised a question of order, namely: That the amendment was in its nature a legislative provision which did not directly relate to any appropriation contained in the bill, and therefore could not be received under the resolution of the Senate of the 29th April last.

In other words, it repealed existing laws!

That is just the ground on which the Senator from Illinois objects to this bill, that it interferes with existing legislation without the repeal of it. That was the direct issue involved. A more incongruous amendment was never offered to an appropriation bill in any legislative body. The Senator from New Jersey was then present in the

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Anthony in the chair) overruled the question of order aide by Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, and decided that the amendment of Mr. Kellogg

Incorporating this election bill as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill—was in order.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Thurman appealed to the Senate; and After debate,
On motion by Mr. Conkling that the appeal lie on the table.

It was determined in the affirmative-yeas 28, nays 2

Among the yeas who voted to lay this appeal on the table and thereby to uphold this species of incongruous legislation legitimate upon an appropriation bill, I find, strange as it may seem, the name of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Frelinghuysen.

Still later, on the same bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] proposed to amend the amendment of Mr. Kellogg by inserting the civil-rights bill, which I will not read, to this appropriation bill. The same question of order was raised that the amendment interfered with existing legislation and was therefore out of order. Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, then being in the chair, sustained the point of order that the proposed amendment of the civil-rights bill was not pertinent, and was therefore out of order. From that decision Mr. Sumner appealed. On the question "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?" the vote was—yeas 33, nays 6. Among the nays and among the yeas I do not find the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] voting. That he was in the Senate is proved by the fact that just subsequently to that vote the Senator's name is found on the vote on the passage of the bill in favor of ing the civil-rights bill, which I will not read, to this appropriation ator's name is found on the vote on the passage of the bill in favor of Mr. Kellogg's amendment. The yeas and nays were demanded by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Blair,] and stood—yeas 31, nays 12. The nays were:

Messrs. Blair, Casserly, Cooper, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Kelly, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stockton.

These citations show who at that time favored that species of leg-lation on appropriation bills and who opposed it. If the Senaislation on appropriation bills and who opposed it. If the Sena-tor from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] could so far sustain an election bill as an amendment upon an appropriation bill, he might strain a point and go for the repeal of an amendment which first saw the light on an appropriation bill. But I might refer to a still more remarkable amendment offered some years since to an appropriation bill. An amendment was offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Sawyer] to amend an appropriation bill by inserting:

To re-imburse the late corporation of Washington for moneys expended by it on account of paving, grading, curbing, and sewerage along Government reservations.

This amendment was a lengthened amendment to re-imburse the city of Washington for moneys paid out and expended in the improvements of this city. Upon a motion to lay that amendment on the table the yeas and nays were ordered and stood—yeas 26, nays 15.

The Senator from New Jersey was, I believe, recorded in the affirmative. I might extend this usage of the Senate as to the incorporation of incongruous amendments upon appropriation bills indefinitely. I have only cited two or three to satisfy the Senator from New Jersey I was right in my statement that precedents were abundant of irrelevant and incongruous amendments to appropriation bills. I have no feeling whatever upon this subject of this amendment. An amendment on an appropriation bill in 1870 increased their pay, and surely it is competent on a similar bill to repeal it.

Mr. LOGAN. It was then that the professors were made a part of the Army by assimilated rank, and of course it extended the longevity ration to them the same as to the rest of the Army. That was all there was of that act.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not hear the Senator.
Mr. LOGAN. I say it was at that time that the West Point professors were given assimilated rank to the Army and made part of the Army.

Mr. STEVENSON. That provision I think was incorporated in the Army bill approved the 15th of July, 1870.

Mr. LOGAN. I think so too.

Then we are right about the date. Therefore

Mr. STEVENSON. Then we are right about the date. Therefore the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely mistaken when he says that we are undertaking to strike at a policy that goes back to the foundation of West Point. I say that this increased longevity pay was adopted for the first time in 1870; that it was a special provision increasing their longevity pay; and that it was done on an appropriation bill. We propose now, as the times are stringent and we allow retired officers of the Army only three-fourths of their pay when in service, to repeal by an appropriation bill this longevity pay of professors. It found its existence on an appropriation bill, and let it find its repeal in a bill of the same character.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, he is correct on one proposition, and that is, it goes to the foundation, because heretofore Army officers were detailed for that duty. Hence he is correct in reference to this act giving assimilated rank to civilians who are employed as professors and making them part of the Army at the time he mentioned. So that both he and the Senator from Pennsylvania are right so far as that is concerned. Now if the Senator will allow me, I do not wish to take up his time, but I wish to correct him on one point, and that is in reference to retirement. He speaks of this law giving them the same rights as other officers of the Army in regard to retirement. The Senator is mistaken in this. He says they are nothing but retired officers. They are officers of the Army with the right to be retired as other officers of the Army. That is what the law means.

Mr. WEST. With the same obligations.
Mr. LOGAN. Yes; but the Senator from Kentucky speaks of it as applying to wounded persons. Now, if he will examine the law of retirement he will find that persons may be retired on account of wounds; that they may be retired on account of disability incurred in any way in the Army; that they may be retired on account of a number of years' service; or they may be retired because they have attained the age of sixty-two years. Hence this law of retirement is applicable to the civilian officers of West Point in applying to their age, and not to wounds, because they have not served in the Army. When they attain the age of sixty-two years they may be retired under this law the same as officers at that age in the Army. That is the meaning of the retirement law.

Mr. STEVENSON. Whether they are voluntarily retired or not, when they do retire they only receive three-fourths of their pay with the rank which they held at the time of retirement.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; that is correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I am not niggardly in this matter; stern necessity requires retrenchment. We have reduced the pay of the brave men whose age and infirmities acquired in the service have placed them on the retired list. I see no injustice in repealing the increased longevity conferred on these professors about six years ago, and which the national necessities require us to suspend.

And now a word or two in reply to the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I know nothing, and I am not allowed to refer to anything which has occurred in the House of Representatives, but I can speak of bills sent to us from the House and now on our tables. Among these is the Army bill which provides the requisite legislation contemplated by this amendment. I think the Senator from Illinois will find that the reason probably that the House of Representatives did not in the pending bill insert a repealing clause such as he referred to is to be found in the fact that the Army bill proposes a further reduction in the rank and file of the Army, and the House deemed it better to provide for all repealing legislation in one bill, so as to make it harmonious and homogeneous. I refer to the Army bill as reported, making provision for the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877. When that bill is reported and passed by the Senate, my word for it that all the objections of the Senator from Illinois will vanish.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, that is exactly the point I was discussing with him the other day. If the Army bill should pass in that form it makes no difference what your appropriation is in this bill. The Army bill reducing the pay would have its effect upon this bill and leave it stand precisely as I suggested; and you will not have legislation in appropriation bills that is considered vicious. That is exactly the point I made; and, if the Senator will stand now by what he said, we will agree precisely. When you pass your Army bill, reducing the pay of officers, it will be applicable to this pay as well as to all other pay; and a provision in this bill would be immaterial.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senate will now pass the House bill before us we can reach the end sought to be attained by the Senator from Illinois by an amendment which I will propose, and which I doubt not would have been offered by the House but for the reason that the Army bill*it was thought would contain it. My proposed amendment to the pending House bill is as follows:

Provided. That the pay herein allowed and given shall be in full of all other pay, allowance, forage, rations, or commutation, except for quarters, fuel, and light; and that the pay for other professors, instructors, and assistants, being officers of the Army, when detailed and assigned to service at the Military Academy, shall be only their Army pay, without increase for term of service and without allowance for forage, rations, or commutation, except for quarters, fuel, and light; and that sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are, repealed; and that all other acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

That would reach the end. That would dissipate all objection. Then there could be no antagonism between the present bill and existing legislation. I never desire incongruous legislation on appropriation bills. I see the honorable Senator from New Jersey in his seat. I again recall to his recollection his vote putting an election law in Louisiana as a relevant amendment upon an appropriation bill. As he was absent from the Senate when I referred to his vote on holding such an amendment legitimate, I recur to it in proof of the fact that I have been much more consistent in resisting these in-congruous amendments on appropriation bills than the Senator himself. I think the record I have quoted bears out this statement. If the honorable Senator could vote for election bills and civil rights bills as amendments to the regular appropriation bill, what is there to startle him in repealing an increase of pay in the professors at West Point, which originated as an amendment for longevity pay only six years ago? It occurs to me a Senator who voted for the first amendments would not have to stretch the blanket very far in voting now to stand by the reduction proposed by the House of Representatives

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that my friend convicts

Mr. FREIMORIU ISEN. It seems to me that my friend convicts himself of quite as great inconsistency as he convicts me. He votes now contrary to his vote then, and he says I do the same thing, Mr. STEVENSON. By no manner of means. It was the appropriation bill for the Military Academy, ending June 30, 1874, that gave this longevity pay to the professors. It is the appropriation bill for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, that proposes to repeal it. There is not much inconsistency in that. Both subjects are germane. The amendment which I propose will harmonize it with existing legislation. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to challenge the production of a single precedent showing incongruous amendments on appropriation bills. Hence my reference to these precedents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg my friend's pardon.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have the Senator's remarks before me, and I will read what he did say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. So have I. What I said was this: that I did not think there was any precedent for the reduction of the salaries of officers of the Army on an appropriation bill. I did not vol-unteer that observation. My friend from Kentucky asked me if it was not usual; and in answer to his question I said that I did not think there was any precedent for it, and I do not yet; but if there was a precedent for it, the sooner it was departed from the better.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from New Jersey said it was—

An anomalous case, and if there is any precedent for it the sooner it is stopped the better, because it is perfectly manifest that the Committee on Appropriations, according to the doctrine insisted upon, could absorb the consideration of every question that comes before Congress.

The direct corollary of all the Senator said on the subject was that the proposed reduction of the House of Representatives ingrafted on this appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point was a direct interference with existing legislation, and therefore a species of vicious and innovating legislation—unknown to the Senator—productive of evil consequences, and not to be indulged in. In reply to that argument I said that the proposed reduction of the professors' pay on an appropriation bill was not extraordinary legislation; that much more incongruous, irrelevant, and dangerous amendments had much more incongraous, irrelevant, and dangerous amendments had been indulged in frequently by the Senate, as I was confident. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to take issue with me. I think the precedents cited proved that I was right. This very increased longevity pay to these professors originated, as I have already stated, for the first time on the West Point appropriation bill. That is a direct precedent of itself. The Senator will hardly deny the postulate that, if the Senate can increase the salaries of professors the postulate that, if the Senate can increase the salaries of professors at West Point without a repeal of existing legislation, they have the same power to reduce them, especially when the increase and reduction were both made on the appropriation bill for the Military Academy. The power to increase and reduce I assume to be correlative.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should think there was a great difference between those cases. I suppose that if an officer has by law a salary fixed at $4,000 a year, and you should appropriate $2,000 a year.

salary fixed at $4,000 a year, and you should appropriate $2,000 a year and say "that all legislation inconsistent herewith is repealed," he would still be entitled to his $4,000; and so my friend thinks, I have no doubt. But if you should with a salary of $4,000 appropriate $5,000 I think he might manage to take the $5,000. I think there is a great difference between reduction and increase in principle.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator does not state the fact of this increased and reduced appropriation correctly. This increased salary of the professors had never reached its present amount until 1874, when this longevity pay was put upon the Military Academy appropriation bill. The Senator objects to the reduction of the pay because it interferes with existing legislation fixing the pay of all officers of the terferes with existing legislation fixing the pay of all officers of the Army. Did not the amendment to the appropriation bill in 1874 increasing the pay of these professors, who constitute a portion of the officers of the Army that have been retired, without any repealing clause of the Army bill, have the same effect? Was not the increase as incongruous as the proposed decrease, so far as any interference in the existing legislation goes? The appropriation bill making the increase did not by terms repeal the general act fixing salaries.

The objection, therefore, of the Senator of New Jersey is more specious than solid.

cious than solid.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am surprised that my friend should so understand, for I said, and all of us certainly know, that we could put the whole legislation of Congress in an appropriation bill, just as well as having the number of bills that we have, as a question of legal power, legislative power. On the question of propriety I said that it would be making the Committee on Appropriations absorb all the other committees, and I certainly think that my friend from Kentucky has argued in the Senate most strenuously against the very course that he is now arguing in favor of; and if I had taken the pains of looking at the RECORD, I think I could have found a good many speeches of his which correspond with what he states his vote was on certain enforcement bills.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should be glad to have them pointed out. I did not intend, and I do not think I have stated that any Senator doubted the absolute power of the Senate to put any amendment they desired on appropriation bills. The question of absolute power was not the point in issue, but it was the vicious and noxious characteristics. acter of the legislation contained in the House bill that the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators were shocked at, and which they insisted had no precedents. Against that argument I have quoted precedents and votes. I submit that for incongruity, irrelevancy, and unparliamentary usage, the amendments voted for and sustained by the Senator from New Jersey greatly exceed the proposed legislation by the House, which is not unusual and has been often resorted to. I say, with the precedents quoted by me, it is too late for Senators now to say it is unusual and vicious legislation. The Senator from New Jersey says that he confined his demand for a precedent only to the reduction of the pay of professors' salaries in an appropriation bill. He admits that the pay of professors may be increased on an appropriation bill, but denies it can be decreased on the same character of bill. I submit to the Senate whether the proposed distinction is very logical or conclusive: It may be my obtuseness, but I really do not perceive the difference.

I have never favored any amendments on appropriation bills which did not relate properly to the subject-matter, and were not in a parliamentary sense germane to an appropriation bill. That has been generally my policy; I will not say I have never violated it. I have generally, however, adhered somewhat closely to the rule, as I have stated. In the present case I have no scruples. The proviso proposed stated. In the present case I have no scruples. The proviso proposed to be offered by me will remove all objection that the House bill is in violation of existing legislation. In every other respect the proposed reduction is germane to the bill. It was a similar bill that increased the pay, and there can be no doubt an amendment repealing the longevity pay is both consistent and harmonious with the first enact-ment. There is no other statute which the present House antagonizes except the one I propose to repeal.

Mr. WEST. Like the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. President, I want to bring the attention of the Senate back to what is the real proposition before the Senate. Whether in doing so I shall find it want to bring the attention of the Senate back to what is the real proposition before the Senate. Whether in doing so I shall find it necessary, as he did, to travel back to the civil-rights bill and the general-election law of the United States, I am not so certain. The simple proposition at issue is, What shall the Senate do in the way of reducing these salaries? If the Senate inclines to follow the example set by the House of Representatives, then it can, in accordance with the usage here, put such a restriction upon the future pay of these officers as will confine their receipts to the amount appropriated in this hill. There cannot be any question about that. But the in this bill. There cannot be any question about that. But the House of Representatives in making the reduction simply stipulated that these officers should this year receive so much, but that there should be no revocation of the amount that was allowed by law. The Senator from Kentucky says that that principle was first inau-gurated upon an appropriation bill. That is scarcely so, because if he will refer back to all the legislation on the subject he will find that the appropriations were always made for additional pay, and it was by statute that they were provided.

Next, the very proposition that the Senator takes so much exception to he himself reported from a committee to this body. I hold in my hand the Congressional Directory for 1873, by which the honorable Senator from Kentucky appears to have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and he assented to the report and voted with the committee in the Senate on this proposition. That is

Then he is equally wrong with reference to the attitude of professors as retired officers; and that is one thing that the Senate ought to fix clearly in its mind. A retired officer of the Army cannot be put on duty as a professor at West Point. There is but one place where he can be put on duty at his retired pay, and that is at the Soldiers' The officers at West Point are active officers of the Army, and only subject to the law in regard to retirement as other officers of the Army are. If they have been in the service forty-five years, the President can retire them; if they have been in the service forty-five years, they can ask to be retired; but they are not retired officers, and they receive full pay.

Now come back to the paring, economical proposition of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Connecticut. Has any Senator here shown that the professors at West Point are paid more than they ought to be paid? That is a simple proposition and that is the one ought to be paid? That is a simple proposition and that is the one we ought to deal with. The House thought they were, and they sent us over a bill reducing the appropriation but not changing the law; consequently, if the Senate assented to the idea of the House the Senate should repeal the law; but the Senate proposes to take a different stand, if I understand it: that the pay is not too much and ought to stand as it is. It was fixed after due deliberation. I had the honor to have charge of the bill that raised the pay, if you call it raising, but it was not a raise in fact. The question now is simply low much do we now these officers and are we amenable to the charge how much do we pay these officers, and are we amenable to the charge that is made here of extravagance? Are we paying in the military institutions of the country more than is paid in the civil institutions of the country? I contend not. Gentlemen may make the assertion broadcast that we are, but they do not demonstrate it. They do not show us in dollars and cents that we are. Now just let us put into dollars and cents what the amendments are. They amount to dividing among twenty-four men $10,000. Who are these twenty-four men? One of them an instructor of practical military engineering; one instructor of ordnance and the science of gunnery. These men get $2,500 by the law and by the amendments. That is all. Is that too much? There are ten other men who get $2,000 by these amendments. Their pay is $1,500, and in each case it is increased $500. In ments. Their pay is $1,500, and in each case it is increased $500. In one case it is increased $500, because the pay is $1,400. So, then, out of eighteen men two get $2,500 and sixteen get $2,000. That is all there is of it. If that is any too much, if the other side of this Chamber can prove that it is too much, can prove that it is out of proportion to what is paid in the civil institutions of the country, I will vote cheerfully with them to reduce it. This ratio of pay was adopted after due reflection, and we ought not to cut it down. It is not a question whether we have the power to cut it down, because nobody read doubt that; but the question as it stands to day is simply first. need doubt that; but the question as it stands to-day is simply, first, whether we shall appropriate what the law requires, or whether we shall not, and next whether the law allows too much. I do not think the other side have made out their case at all; that is to say, that we are amenable to the charge of paying in the military institutions of the country more than is paid in the civil institutions of the country; and I think on that subject the Senator who has charge of this bill has some information.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has answered the Senator from Kentucky perhaps better than I could answer, so far as he has answered his argument. The Senator from Kentucky seems to lay great stress on the fact that in 1870 we provided for lonseems to lay great stress on the fact that in 1870 we provided for longevity pay, which he says is a new feature in our legislation. I do not so understand the legislation of Congress with reference to the Army. We have had the principle of longevity pay in the Army from the very organization of the Government continuously; it never has been changed. When we re-organized the pay of the Army we substituted a money longevity pay for a ration longevity pay. That was all; and that was in 1867. When we placed the professors at West Point some of them with the assimilated rank of colonel and some with the assimilated rank of lieutenant-colonel, of course the pay of with the assimilated rank of lieutenant-colonel, of course the pay of those ranks would follow, that being the ordinary pay of similar offi-cers in the Army. This assimilated rank is not a new thing, as the Senator from Kentucky would suggest, ingrafted upon an appropriation bill in 1870. I hold in my hand the second volume of the United States statutes providing for the organization of the Military Academy in 1812, by which the professors in the Military Academy are ranked as lieutenant-colonels in the Army. In 1866, I believe, we proranked as neutenant-colonels in the Army. In 1800, I believe, we provided that professors of the Military Academy who had served thirty-five years should be ranked as colonels in the Army; and that carried up either two orthree professors—I think two, Professor Weir and Professor Church. Afterward, in 1870, we provided that all professors who had served ten years at West Point should receive the rank of colonels in the Army. So we have continuously legislated on the theory of the present law, from the very foundation of the Military Academy.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is immensely disturbed because possibly a first lieutenant may be assigned to duty as an assistant professor and receive the rank and pay of a major in the Army. We are not responsible for that legislation. That legislation also is found in the very organization of the Military Academy. These assistant professors at West Point have been paid as captains or majors of the Army from 1812 until this time; and the Secretary of War and the President of the United States have always been authorized to assign first lieutenants to assistant professorships; and when they were so assigned they have received the higher pay.

The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Kentucky would have us believe that we have inaugurated some extraordinary provisions here with reference to the Military Academy. Whatever these provisions are we have inherited them. They have been upon our statute-books practically for more than fifty years; and we are simply carrying out the old provisions and providing for the organization of West Point as it has stood almost from its organization. The longevity pay is no new feature. If these assistant professors are majors, this appropriation does not apply to them. If they are light they are light to the army they would only received. lieutenants, in their position in the Army they would only receive $1,500 a year; but if they are assigned to West Point, which all agree and admit is an expensive place to live, we add to their pay, as has been done since 1812, the difference between the pay of a first lieutenant and that of a major. That is all.

The Senator from Connecticut says that we are paying those men more than similar professors and teachers receive in the colleges of the United States. I must be permitted to deny that proposition. He cited Columbia College, I, believe. Does he not know that the professors in Columbia College receive $6,000 each per annum for their services? He also cited the case of Harvard. The professors at Harvard. vard, as I understand, receive $3,500, and the assistant professors from $2,500 to $3,000—more than we pay these assistant instructors by the provisions of this bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

I am willing to go with him, as doubtless this side of the Chamber I am willing to go with him, as doubtless this side of the Chamber is willing to go with him, in any measure of true economy; but West Point is no place to begin this economy. These professors and teachers are engaged in instructing young men for future usefulness as officers in the Army, and it is no place to begin to reduce their compensation below a point at which they can afford to remain there and instruct these youths. Therefore, Mr. President, I stand not only upon the law but I stand also much the reasonableness of this ray as applied. these youths. Therefore, Mr. Freshell, I stand how only apon the law, but I stand also upon the reasonableness of this pay as applied to the instructors at West Point.

Mr. STEVENSON. In reply to the Senator from Iowa I desire to say that by the act of July 15, 1870, it was provided—

That the professors of the United States Military Academy whose service in the Army and at the academy exceeds thirty-five years—

Not ten, not fifteen; but exceeds thirty-five yearsshall have the pay of colonel; and those whose like service is less than thirty-five but exceeds twenty-five years, shall have the pay of lieutenant-colonel.

That was the act of 1870. In 1873 we left out the thirty-five years and came down to the ten years, as I understand.

and came down to the ten years, as I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the difference.

Mr. ALLISON. That I understand.

Mr. STEVENSON. You see how it goes up and how many more get this increased longevity pay. That is what I meant by saying that the increase was of recent date; and by that I stand. I say that by the act of 1870 an officer had to be at the academy thirty-five that by the act of 1870 an omeer had to be at the academy thirty-live years before he could get the pay of colonel, and before he could get the pay of lieutenant-colonel he had to be there twenty-five years. Then, when we come to the act of 1873, which the House of Representatives wants to repeal, it says:

That the professors of the United States Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant colonel.

That is a provision which was put on the Military Academy appropriation bill in 1873. That is the provision that I have been arguing in favor of repealing.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that perfectly; but what I meant to say, and what I do say, is, that these professors ranked as lieutenant-colonels in 1812, and they stood so until 1851 or 1852—I do not remem-ber the precise year—and then we gave them an annual compensa-tion in lieu of their rank, and that annual compensation stood again until this provision was attached to an appropriation bill in 1870; and, as my friend from Louisiana [Mr. West] suggests, the thirty-five years applied equally to the Army and to the academy, and it was changed afterward, as was stated, in 1873, by which the rank of colonel was affixed to those professors who had served ten years at the academy. This provision we have passed long since, and I only made the reply that I did to the Senator from Kentucky because I thought he misapprehended the provisions organizing the Military

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. McCREERY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, on these amendments I seem to be a little outside any "healthy organization," and I want to apologize for it as well as I can. I did not vote on the last amendment and shall not vote on this upon the ground that I want to reduce salaries, nor for the purpose of advertising my hunger for economy nor by way of indicating any hostility or ill-will to West Point. I believe in West Point. I do not believe our salaries are too high as a rule; and I certainly do not believe that the salaries we pay to the military officers are higher than they should be. Nevertheless I do not see why I am called upon to vote for these amendments. The Senator from Iowa has read us the statute which declares indeed that Senator from Iowa has read us the statute which declares indeed that the salary of this instructor shall be the pay of a major or captain-which is it?

Mr. ALLISON. Instructor of military engineering, major.

Mr. HOWE. Shall be the pay of a major. Now, you appropriate in another bill the full pay of all the majors you have; and if a major is detailed for this duty, as a major might well be detailed, then he is abundantly paid in your Army appropriation bill. If you mean to require that a first lieutenant shall be detailed to the duty of an instructor and mean to comply with that statute and give him the pay of a major, then of course you must appropriate something in addition to the pay of the lieutenant. The pay of the lieutenant is appropriated in the Army hill and you must make un the difference here. priated in the Army bill and you must make up the difference here. If you do not make this appropriation and a major is assigned to that duty, he is paid. The only effect of making this appropriation, as it seems to me, is to impose a sort of duty on the Secretary to send a first lieutenant there instead of sending a major.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that at present the instructor of ordnance and gunnery is a major and the in-structor of military engineering is a captain, so that they do not feel obliged to send lieutenants for that purpose now.

Mr. HOWE. Neither should we be obliged to make the appropri-ion. There seems to be no sort of occasion for it whatever. This will be a surplus if they are kept there.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there are just these two objections to this appropriation: One that it increases the pay of the Army just $900; and, second, I think it degrades, demoralizes the service, diminishes the value of the service, lowers the character of I need not spend any time to show that it increases the pay of the Army. That is patent on the face of the amendment. But how does it lower the standard of the service? I assume that a major should be more competent than a first lieutenant. He has had precisely the same education as a first lieutenant, and he has had all the experience and education that are incidental to service from the time he is commissioned as a first lieutenant till he is promoted to a major. That is worth something. But if you insist upon carrying this additional pay, there is a sort of duty laid upon the Secretary of War, in order to make use of the appropriation, that just as fast as a man reaches a majority he is to be sent away from West Point and a first lieutenant put there, for no reason in the world but to absorb this additional $900. It does not seem to me to be entirely worth while; and for that reason I voted against the last amendment, and propose to vote against this.
Mr. DAVIS.

What are we voting on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These several amendments.

Mr. DAVIS. Between what lines ?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on line 16 and ending on line 28 of the printed bill, inclusive.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 33, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalis Johnston, Key, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—3:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cockrell, Davis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Howe, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Stevenson, and Whyte—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcoin, Bruce, Burnside, Caperton, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gordon, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, and Thurman—23.

So the amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 34 to line 42, inclusive, as follows:

For sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496: Provided, That sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes,' be, and the same are, repealed.

And in lieu thereof to insert-

For pay of Military Academy band, $14,880.

Mr. ALLISON. The explanation of this amendment is simply that the law for the organization of the Army as it stands in the Revised Statutes provides for a band at West Point; and the act of March 3, 1875, sections 9 and 10, simply fixed the organization of this band,

SECTION 9. That the Military Academy band shall consist of one teacher of music, who shall be leader of the band, and may be a civilian, and of forty enlisted musicians of the band.

cians of the band.

SEC. 10. That the teacher of music shall receive $90 per month, one ration, and the allowance of fuel of a second lieutenant of the Army; and that, of the enlisted musicians of the band, ten shall each be paid $34 per month; and the remaining thirty shall each be paid $30 per month; and that the enlisted musicians of the band shall have the benefits as to pay, arising from re-enlistments and length of service, applicable to other enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to ask the Senator whether these provisions Mr. DAVIS. Allowing to ask the Senator whether these provisions are in an appropriation bill or in a separate act?
Mr. ALLISON. The sections I have just read?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALLISON. I should infer that they were in an appropriation bill, from the fact that this act seems to be an act appropriating

Mr. DAVIS. So I thought; but the Senator read them as if they were taken from the Statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. These two sections simply provide for the organization of this band. Prior to this time the number of musicians, I believe, was not so great, but I do not remember the number. This act of March 3, 1875, provides simply for the number that shall comprise this band, and also fixes the pay of those musicians.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Iowa was asked whether there was any band authorized except in an appropriation bill, and he answered any band authorized except in an appropriation bill, and he answered that he thought so, as I understood.

Mr. ALLISON. No. I simply say that these two sections which are repealed by the House bill provide for the organization of this band, the composition of it. The Revised Statutes not only authorize a band but say that the military organization of the United States shall consist, among other items, of a band, which shall be stationed to tweet Point.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the law. The band is stationed at the Military Academy as part of the organization of the Army.

Mr. ALLISON. When the Army was re-organized in 1866, as the Senator from Illinois will remember, we provided for fifteen bands, but afterward I believe the law authorizing those bands was repealed

That remains, and the sections which now are proposed to be repealed in this House bill simply provide for the composition of the band. The committee believe that, if a band is to be at West Point at all, (and they think that a band is necessary at the Military Academy,) the present organization of the band is a proper one, and therefore they have recommended the striking out of the clause in the House bill and the retention of the military band at West Point.

House bill and the retention of the military band at West Point.

Mr. DAVIS. This question, as I understand it, stands on a different footing from the one we have voted on or from any previous amendment. The previous amendments were to carry out existing law. That was admitted on all sides. This amendment is not exactly in the same condition; and, if it were, the bill itself as it came from the House provides for the repeal of the present law, so that Senators could not have the same objection that they had to the other clauses of the bill which were proposed to be amended. The question here turns on whether it is proper and right and necessary to have the hand as provided for by the amendment of the Senate to have the band as provided for by the amendment of the Senate committee.

It will be seen that as the bill came to us it provides for sixteen musicians and repeals so much of the act of March 3, 1875, as provides for forty musicians. The expenditure of money for this purpose, as the bill came to us, would be $2,400; the expenditure, as this amendment if adopted will make it, will be $14,880. The number will be sixteen in one instance and forty in the other. It is a question entirely with the Senate whether they want a band, or whether there should be a band there of forty or of sixteen, the difference between the House bill and the amendment.

Again, the sixteen, as I understand, are provided for by law and have been probably for fifty years; for a long time at any rate. The twenty-four additional were added in 1875, according to the Senator from Iowa who has charge of the bill, and I believe his statement is correct. So in the one instance if we adopt the Senate amendment we must make some provision for a repeal of the old law, while if we take the bill as it came from the House we shall find provisions are made for the repeal, if repeal be necessary, of the clause in the appropriation bill of 1875, and the old law is fulfilled by providing for sixteen musicians.

Now, so that we may know what we are doing on this appropriation bill, I desire to say that the total amount appropriated by this bill as it came from the House of Representatives to us was $259,231. There were added by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate $46,714, making the total bill, as recommended by the Senate committee, $305,945. That amount is somewhat less than the bills of pretee, $305,945. That amount is somewhat less than the bills of previous years. For instance, last year it was $364,740; the year previous, $339,835; for 1874, $344,319; for 1873, $326,101.32. Thus it appears that the present bill, even as reported by the Senate committee, is somewhat less than has been appropriated for the Military Academy for several years previous. The question before us now, though, is whether we shall strike out what the House has sent us, and which is whether we shall strike out what the House has sent us, and which is in accordance with a law of long standing as to the band, and add that which has no law to sustain except the appropriation bill of 1875; and, if there should be, there is a provision in the bill to repeal it. There is a difference of upward of $12,000 in the expenditure as now recommended by the Senate committee and as passed by the House

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I think this matter can be very readily understood. The corps of cadets is divided into four companies. To each of those companies are attached by law four musicians, making sixteen, as will be seen by reference to section 1322 of the Revised

To each company shall be added four musicians.

Then by reference to section 1111:

There shall be retained or enlisted in the Army one band, which shall consist of one band leader, and not more than twenty-four musicians, and shall ordinarily be stationed at the Military Academy.

That makes the forty musicians, twenty-four being the band organized by law and sixteen composed of the four to each of the companies of cadets. As the law provides for the whole of them and the House bill leaves out the band entirely, and it is inserted by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the amendment is simply a compliance with the law.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand the object of this repeal of sections 9 and 10 of the act of last year by one appropriation committee of Congress. I suppose persons will be considered rather extravagant who insist upon all these appropriations. The repeal of these gant who insist upon all these appropriations. The repeal of these sections 9 and 10 amounts to a repeal of the number authorized by law to constitute the band at the Military Academy at West Point and the amount of pay fixed by law. But suppose you repeal sections 9 and 10 of the appropriation bill of last year, you still have the law creating a band at West Point, because you find in the Revised Statutes that the organization of the Army of the United States shall consist of one general, one lieutenant-general, and so on of a purpose of various officers: number of various officers:

One band stationed at the Military Academy.

That is a part of the organization of the Army, and sections 9 and 10 of the act of 1875 only fix the number that shall constitute the band and the amount of pay the musicians shall receive. Now suppose you repeal those sections 9 and 10, and leave this section of the Revised Statutes standing authorizing a band, who is to say then what number of musicians shall constitute that band?

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand the bill as it came to us it says sixteen musicians shall constitute that band.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be in addition to the band already provided, will it not?

Mr. LOGAN. That is the point that it seems so strange to me is not well understood. The sixteen musicians allowed by law, in connec-tion with the four companies into which the cadets are organized at West Point, are a mere drum-corps, not a band. There is such a thing as a drummer and a fifer belonging to each company, and that force is organized as a drum-corps, not as a band; but the musicians that belong to the companies may be organized as part of the band, and are organized in it, and become a part of the band. Is it not a fact well known that when the Army was re-organized after the war it was done upon the principles of economy? Instead of having a band at every post, connected with every regiment, the bands were abolished by act of Congress, and but one band permitted for the whole Army of the United States, and that to be stationed at West Point. They have at some places bands that they have improvised, composed of soldiers, men belonging to the Army who have learned to be musicians, and have organized themselves together at posts merely to have music at the posts; but they are not bands as known to the law, not bands of the Army. We have nothing now in the Army but mere drum-corps, except this one band at West Point; and there is not a man in this country, I care not what he may say about economy, who has not enough pride existing in him to say that we should have at least one band in the United States of America authorized by law. People will begin to think that we have no music in our souls at all. as a drummer and a fifer belonging to each company, and that force is at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And are given to "stratagems and spoils."
Mr. LOGAN. Yes, "treason, stratagems, and spoils;" but a new era has dawned in this country. Economy! Why, sir, there is no such thing as economy in this. The idea that an army of forty regiments of this Government shall have no such thing as a band connected with it—I will not use the term "disgraceful," but it approaches that your much if we shall say that there shall be no head proaches that very much if we shall say that there shall be no band in the Army of the United States. Forty musicians are all we ask for. I have seen forty bands, not forty musicians, on the battle-field, and to music the soldier will tread quicker than to anything else in the world. Music excites and incites in him patriotism; it fills his soul with that feeling that should be found in the bosom of a patriot who not only loves his country but is ready to fight and to die for it. But the latter-day saints of economy want to drive music from the land. I presume they would like to drive poetry out of the land, and everything else, except a false economy, a pretext before the country that they are going to economize, and by economy they mean cutting off this band, so that at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia the United States of America shall not have a band! What kind of a Country are you? What kind of a country shall we be thought to be? What will people think of us if we are so niggardly that we will not even have money appropriated for one band for the Government of the United States of America? I would be ashamed of it, and any man who will stand up before this country and plead economy on such a proposition as this, I will not say is a demagogue; I will say no such thing; but I will say that if I were to do it I should be a demagogue.

Sir, that kind of economy amounts to nothing. I would be in favor, if it was left to me, of having a band at every post in the United States, and it would be right. You cannot make good soldiers with-out music. It never could be anywhere, and never will be. You cannot teach them the step without music. You have got to have it; you must have it. The officers need it as well as the men. There is something inspiring in it that makes him feel as though he had a heart and a soul and had patriotism in him. But our democratic friends want to step to the thump of a drum without a horn. [Laughter.] I presume, probably, you do not like the music of the country that we have now. It may be that that is it. Perhaps the music is not the right kind; it does not play the right kind of tunes. I will not say that either, because that might be thought to be offensive; but I will say that upon this bill the economy, or pretended economy, that has been exhibited is of a character to show a misunderstanding of what the Government needs; to show a want of knowledge of what an army needs and what an army requires. It shows an absence of that knowledge which ought to belong to a man at least who Provides for the soldiery of the country.

I do not presume there is a man belonging to the Army of the United States, from the last private who enlisted up to the General of the Army, but what will tell you that the idea of abolishing all the bands of the Army is something that strikes a soldier as being very strange. I hope that these sections will not be repealed, and that at least the small amount of patriotism that we have left in this country will allow us to have one poor insignificant band in the whole United States of America that belongs to the Army of the country, and that may play "Yankee Doodle" every time they get a chance.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I have purposely waited until this amendment should be presented to say what I intended to say in regard to the different amendments presented to this bill in the Senate and in regard to the academy at West Point in general. I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments.

I am not an enemy of West Point, and yet I have for many years looked upon that institution as standing contrary to the institutions under which we live. West Point is not now what it was intended to be when first organized under the administration of General Wash-ington; nor is it what it was intended to be under the act of 1812, which gave it a new organization. It is a growth year by year, year by year, adding one appropriation and then another, until it has become a large institution, very expensive, and I believe extremely injurious to the Army, and consequently injurious to the country. I believe that if we intend to maintain an army we ought not to educate our men entirely at institutions like West Point, but we ought to do what it was intended at first should be done, provide that soldiers in the Army, after having served a few years as private soldiers and having attained to some of those non-commissioned positions, as and having attained to some of those non-commissioned positions, as sergeants, or even the lesser grade of corporal, should be recommended by their respective regiments to West Point, there to perfect themselves in military science, military engineering, and artillery. That was the intention originally, and no doubt was the intention of the act of 1812; but it was soon misconstrued, and has been going on from that day to this, until now West Point is an educational institution where the sons of the most influential men of the country are sent to receive not a military education, but a civil education; and hence we are daily increasing the professorships and since I have had the bonor daily increasing the professorships, and since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor we have added a professor of Spanish. Why should a professor of Spanish be necessary for the education of an American soldier? Yet that is the law to-day, and this professor of Spanish is included in the very amendments which have been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest why he is necessary

Mr. BOGY. I will receive the suggestion with pleasure. I presume I know the reason assigned, but I will receive it from the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I had something to do with that question once, and I came to the conclusion that so far as that language was concerned it was more necesary at West Point than any other foreign language that is taught there, for the reason that a great portion of our border is covered by those who speak the Spanish language. All along the Mexican border, on the frontier up through New Mexico, in a part of our own country, our own language is hardly known; and it is absolutely necessary for officers stationed on the border of Mexico and in New Mexico to understand the Spanish language. I know when I was stationed there myself many years ago I had to learn the Spanish language; I was compelled to do it as an officer in order to get along. I was acting as quartermaster; and instead of having an interpreter I was my own interpreter. That is the necessity for it; it saves ex-

I was aware of that-

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to say that we had provided for a professor of Spanish since he became a member of this

Mr. BOGY. I understand that that professorship was added in the last two years.

Mr. ALLISON. He was provided for during Mr. Buchanan's administration, either in 1857 or 1858. So I think it must certainly have been before the time of the Senator here.

Mr. LOGAN. Spanish has been taught in the Military Academy for fifteen years at least.
Mr. BOGY. It may be so; but I thought he had been provided for in the last two or three years. The fact, however, does not change the character of my argument at all. I am aware of the apology made for such a professor at West Point. Knowledge is always ornamental, besides being now and then extremely useful; and it would be very well if all our West Point graduates should understand Spanish thoroughly, and it would be very well if they all understood English thoroughly, too, and it would not hurt them to understand French pretty well; and in these latter days the German is much more important than either the French or English, for a large portion of the soldiers are Germans, and they ought to be spoken to in their own native language. It is a mere apology. In other words, a military school has drifted to be a school for the education of young gentlemen for civil life, and nothing else. You have professors of international law and professors of constitutional law. It does not hart a West Pointer to know international law or constitutional law; but is it proper for us who have the voting of the money of the people of the United States to educate anybody to a knowledge of international law or constitutional law? I say it does not make him a better soldier; I say it does not make him a more valiant soldier; and I say more, as a general proposition, sustained by the history of the world, that just in proportion to his high education is he in a position to be dissatisfied with the Army as a soldier. The men who have written their names in history as great military men were not men so well versed in all the different languages and different sciences, from Cæsar down. Cæsar himself was, but many of his successors were not. Under the French Republic and Empire I think some twenty-three marshals rose from the ranks, from being private soldiers. Such men as Ney, and Massena, and Soult, and Murat, and Oudinot, and Bernadotte, and I do not remember how many others, but some twenty-odd, from being private soldiers rose to be marshals of France, and have written their names on the pages of history as great military characters. Wellington himself was not educated in the royal college of Great Britain. He entered the army as an ensign, and was sent immediately to the East Indies, and rose step by step until he got to be generalissimo of the armies of Europe, never having been educated generalissimo of the armies of Europe, never having been educated at a military academy. In our own country the men who have left the brightest names behind them as great military men were not educated at West Point. General Brown was not educated at West Point. General Gaines was not educated at West Point. Zachary Taylor was not educated at West Point. Zachary Taylor was not educated at West Point. And greater than all of these men, Andrew Jackson was not educated at West Point.

So it is that an academy of this kind is not an absolute necessity; nevertheless I am willing that there should be a school in this cornever the second of the nevertheless I am willing that there should be a school in this country where military science can be taught as a science. But the scientific part of the Army education is limited. However high the degree tife part of the Army education is limited. However high the degree may be; the circle is limited; it is military engineering and artillery; and I say that if you will confine it to those two branches that are purely scientific, you need not keep the cadets at West Point longer than two years; and a bright boy will go through in one year. You will not learn camp life and mere drill and all the habits of a soldier in four years at West Point as well as you will in the Army on the plains. In one year of drilling on the plains you will learn more than you will by being forty years at West Point dancing around to the music of a band of fifty-six different pieces.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to make on this occasion are

Mr. President, it is not my intention to make on this occasion an elaborate speech. Much could be said with regard to West Point. Such is not my intention to-day. I am not an enemy of West Point. I feel for a large number of its graduates the most friendly feelings, which go back I may say forty years. Many of them have been my personal bosom friends, and are to-day. But I will say that for its age, and the number of its graduates, and the large amount of money which has been expended on West Point, it has turned out fewer able men than any institution in the country. You have had professors of mathematics there for very mathematics there for years. How many great mathematicians have you turned out from West Point? They can be enumerated from other colleges by the dozen. It has turned out few.

My idea of a military school at West Point would involve an expenditure of not exceeding $50,000 a year; perhaps not that much. That would be the maximum amount that I can reach. Then you would have a good military Spartan school, where brave boys could be educated to become brave soldiers, and where none but brave boys would be anxious and willing to go. Now it is held out as an inducement for pampered youths, the sons of the wealthy and of the powerful for pampered youths, the sons of the wealthy and of the powerful and of the luxurious, to go there and spend four years in the most pleasant recreation imaginable. It should be abolished; it is in contradiction to our whole system of government. I wish to change it. I know that it cannot be changed by my speech made at this moment; and yet I wish these facts to go out, let them be worth what they may. Now, sir, we are upon the amendment in regard to music. It opens the whole subject, and is a key to all this education at West Point. The Senator from Illinois, who is no doubt exceedingly fond of music, and from what he says I presume has a dash of poetry about him besides a good deal of military genius, says that a man is deficient in military ardor, in a spirit of love of country or patriotism, unless he can hear an abundance of good music. Now, suppose the cadets do hear music at West Point; before they can engage the enemy (which does not exist now, so far as we know) the impressions made upon does not exist now, so far as we know) the impressions made upon near music at West Foint; before they can engage the enemy (which does not exist now, so far as we know) the impressions made upon their minds will have been entirely done away with. What good does it do the young chaps there now to have all this music poured into their souls every day? It will all go away again. It goes in with ease and goes out with as much ease. The impression is but momentary. Why should there be a band of fifty-six fellows playing upon the French horn, and the German horn, and the Italian bugle, and the Irish bagpipes, and all the other instruments? It is nothing but a farce. It is throwing away the money of the people.

This band of music is used for one purpose, as I will tell you. West Point is, of all places in the United States, the most elegant for a gentleman to visit. You have there the nicest soirées, the nicest horeand the nicest little balls, the most delightful entertainments. You are surrounded all the time not only with charming music, but I might use the word ravishing music, and all paid by whom? By the young chaps who hear it? No, sir; paid by the great mass of the people, who do not know what has become of their money. I say that a military band of music should consist of the drum and the fife. The drum and the fife with good captains and brave soldiers will conquer the world; and your German blowers, and your Irish bagpipes, and your French bugles, and Italian bugles will do no good in time of battle. Those fellows will all hold back then. [Laughter.] Music is middle the middle of the poople the world the part that the first that the properties of the part of battle. Those fellows will all hold back then. [Laughter.] Music in military life is a good thing; but of all the music ever invented the fife and the drum is the most martial. As old as I am and as unmartial as I am, I always feel a little martial when I hear the fife and the drum; but the others do not excite me at all.

Mr. President, the great men of the Republic for many years have fought West Point without success. There has been a sort of "ring" formed in Congress for fifty years that has carried appropriations for West Point. I will read you a letter written by no less a man than Nathaniel Macon, one of the great men from your State, sir, [addressing Mr. MERRIMON,] as great a man as this country has afforded—Nathaniel Macon. Here is a letter which he wrote to Colonel Benton:

Why does the Army of late years desert more than formerly? Because the officers have been brought up at West Point, and not among the people. Soldiers desert, because not attached to the service or not attached to the officers. West Point cadets prevent the promotion of good sergeants, and men cannot like a service which denies them promotion, nor like officers who get all the commissions. The increase of pay will not cure the evil, and nothing but promotion will. In the revolutionary army we had many distinguished officers who entered the Army as privates.

As it is now, a private in the Army of the United States, the only real republic in the world, never can become an officer. In every

As it is now, a private in the Army of the United States, the only real republic in the world, never can become an officer. In every country of Europe privates are promoted every day to commissions in the army. In Great Britain, in France, in Germany, in Italy, and everywhere else they are promoted every day. Here a private, I do not care what may be his merit, never can be more than a private soldier. The effect is very plain. The Army of the United States is composed of lower material, because a man of pride will not go into the Army when he knows that however well he may behave he never can be anything else than a private.

The appointments at West Point should be reduced. First the term of education should not exceed two years, if more than one. It should not exceed two years, beyond a doubt. Confine the education to military engineering and artillery, and nothing more. That they could learn in two years. Then again, instead of having some four hundred students there, let the number be cut down by one-half, if not three-fourths, and let that be furnished from the private soldiers on the recommendation of the officers, and be promoted. Then you would have an efficient army; the soldiers would be more efficient and better; the expense would be cut down; and everything else would be improved. These, Mr. President, in brief, are my views expressed in a very desultory manner, but nevertheless I think I am correct. West Point must be reformed from cellar to garret, from the foundation to the roof; and it ought to be done speedily. I know that now, and I have no doubt it has been the case from year to year, this subject is hedged around all the time with great difficulty and intricacy. For instance, the question was presented to-day and argued by two great lawyers.

around all the time with great difficulty and intricacy. For instance, the question was presented to-day and argued by two great lawyers, one from Connecticut and the other from Illinois, as to whether you could reach an appropriation for a certain office by merely limiting the amount appropriated. The Senator from Illinois says as a lawyer that if a certain office is created, and if in making an appropriation for that office you appropriate less than the salary fixed by law, the officer nevertheless may be entitled to the amount which has been affixed to that office. Although the appropriation not being made he could not for the time being get his money, nevertheless it would not affect his right, and at some day or other he would come to Congress and ask to be paid that which he was legally entitled to receive. I think myself the Senator from Illinois as a lawyer was right; but the Senator from Connecticut as a man who is striving at economy is right. What we cannot do in a legal way we must try to do in another way, provided it be a fair way. The lower House of Congress say we want to get at this thing in that way; we will try you in that manner. The lawyers of the Senate say "you must do this thing in a legal way, and if you do not do it in a legal way you cannot do it at all." This is the trouble, and I have no doubt it has been the trouble for a legal way.

The professors at West Point are paid excessively. I am not now and never have been in favor of low salaries. I profess to be not a demagogue in any sense of the term; I never paraded that character in my life; but I do think these professors are paid excessively. I presume, if the matter was looked into carefully, it would be found that these gentlemen who are now receiving $3,500 a year nominally are really receiving five six or seven thems and dellars a year indirectly. these gentlemen who are now receiving $3,500 a year nominally are really receiving five, six, or seven thousand dollars a year indirectly. They get their pay directly. Then they get their quarters; they get their fuel; they get their lights; and of course they get their music for nothing. That is natural; there is so much of it around there. Then they have a right to buy for their table everything which is furnished by the quartermaster's and commissary departments, at first cost. They get their medical attendance for nothing. They have all the advantages of dancing professors there for their boys and girls, for nothing; and so on, so that the pay amounts to five, six, or seven thousand dollars a year. I am willing to pay a gentleman of education who is a professor at West Point, or at any other place, a fair and liberal compensation; but I think the compensation is too large.

tion who is a professor at. West Point, or at any other place, a fair and liberal compensation; but I think the compensation is too large.

Again, I say that there ought not to be at West Point one single professor who is not an officer of the Army. Every man who is a teacher there ought to be an officer in the Army and he should get the pay and the pay alone to which his grade entitles him. You will find plenty of men in the Army who are competent for it. I do not know how much is paid to a professor of dancing, but I am very well satisfied that there is one there; and I am very well satisfied that he is paid at the public expense. Dancing is one of the accomplishments taught to these young men to enable them to go and fight on the western frontier! these young men to enable them to go and fight on the western frontier! What good does that do them along with this music? The whole thing is an abuse, and Congress ought at this session to appoint a committee of intelligent, competent, educated men to examine the whole subect from one end to the other, and bring about the reformation which ject from one end to the other, and oring about the reformation which it needs. Do away with all this growth of time that has gradually been fastened like barnacles upon this body. I think whenever you do away with it you will find that $50,000 a year is enough.

I am opposed, too, to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. What an outrage! Will ever a Nelson, or a Perry, or a McDonough, or a Decatur be brought out by Annapolis? Never in the world. The way to make a naval hero is to take him on a vessel right off as soon as he to make a naval hero is to take him on a vessel right off as soon as he enters the service; let him be seasick the next day and let him alone; have a professor to teach him navigation and gunnery, which he will learn very soon; it is not so difficult. Then you will make a sailor of him, such a sailor as Nelson was in England, and McDonough, and Decatur, and Truxton, and Lawrence, and Perry here, and a great many others who learned the art of naval warfare on the bosom of the broad ocean, and not in any naval academy.

I could not help thinking a while ago when my friend from Illinois was arguing about music being so necessary at West Point, as being the only military band left in the United States, all the other bands having been disbanded, that no doubt, when all the others were disbanded, they had plenty of able and eloquent advocates on this floor saying that if those bands were disbanded the regiments would disband. No doubt, that was said, and yet the bands have been disbanded and the regiments are banded yet. Then I thought of this great band called "the marine band." That is a useful institution to this country, is it not? It is very useful? Of what use on the face of the earth to the people of the United States is the marine band at the navy-yard here? Why not have a simple band of music and let the people know it is a band to be used by the President of the broad ocean, and not in any naval academy. and let the people know it is a band to be used by the President of the United States at his levees and entertainments, for which the peo-

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We go and hear it play.

Mr. BOGY. We go and hear it. I go myself but very seldom. I have been there, however, and have no objection to any one going. Now is not the marine band a farce? Most of the people think this Now is not the marine band a farce? Most of the people think this band, called the marine band, now-and then steps upon a vessel and sails around the world, and plays the tunes of republican freedom to the nations of the world, and in that way inspires them with the love of freedom; but I believe if these chaps were to go upon the deck of a vessel it would make them sea-sick right off. They are only used to play when the President needs a band. I say this in no spirit of unkindness to the gentleman who is the Executive at this time. His predecessors did the same thing, but it is wrong. Let that band be disbanded.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I see the Senator has discovered it now. I have dis covered it before. He is very familiar with history and with the deeds of our great military and naval heroes.

Mr. BOGY. I read their history when I was a boy.
Mr. LOGAN. My question is, whether in his reading he has not discovered that desertions in an army are always greater where bands of music do not exist than where bands of music do exist?

Mr. BOGY. I do not think my reading will sustain any such as-

Mr. LOGAN. I did not know but that the Senator was familiar with that fact.

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator gives it to me as his reading and experience, I will of course succumb.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will examine the reports made by different officers of different armies over the world he will find that that Mr. BOGY. There may be something in that; there is something in music.

Mr. LOGAN. I can say that there is a great deal in music.
Mr. BOGY. I am myself extremely fond of it; but I like to pay for it, and have others pay for it as well.
Mr. LOGAN. If I can judge from what I see here, I can discover a reason why the democracy do not desire bands. They do not need wind instruments. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOGY. I did not hear the last remark of my friend. I have no doubt it was very good and very pointed, and I am sorry that I lost it.

Mr. LOGAN. I say the democracy are not in need of wind instru-

Mr. BOGY. O! I am very glad to see that my friend has some recollection of his past democratic history; and he knows that we are not given to blowing our own horn. [Laughter.] Doubtless he knows us to be plain, matter of fact men, who go for the substance and not for the sound of useless music.

In conclusion, speaking with all seriousness, I wish it distinctly understood that I have no enmity to West Point at all. I look upon it as an institution which has grown upon this country beyond the intention of the originators of the institution, and it is longer not only useless, but extremely injurious. It is destroying to-day the morale of the Army of the United States. Besides a cost of from $350,000 to $400,000, it destroys the morale of every soldier who is enlitted. Util to the the adding the house that although a wirest here. listed. Hold up to the soldier the hope that, although a private, he may become a general, and you at once infuse into the Army manly and noble spirits. Men of good intentions, and of good blood, and of good aspirations, who are fond of that life, will go into the Army. Military life has its attractions for a large portion of the human family, and there are thousands of young men in the United States of fair education and of good morals who would join the Army and behave well so as to secure promotion, who now do not go there because they know they never can be promoted. They never will go there as long as this institution at West Point is maintained on the footing that it is now. It destroys the whole of that spirit, and in that respect it is more aristocratical than any institution in Europe to-day without any exception. I say that promotion in the Army of the United States from the ranks to a commissioned officer is more difficult than it is in any portion of Europe to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish the Senator would withdraw his motion only for a minute. I want to say a word about bands.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Not now; do it to-morrow.
Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

INSTRUCTIONS ISSUED BY THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, in response to House resolution of the 21st instant requesting the Attorney-General to furnish the authority by which certain instructions alleged to be in contravention of the long-established rule relating to the testimony of accomplices in criminal cases were given to subordinates.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for the reading of that communication.

The communication was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 26, 1876.

Washington, February 26, 1876.

To the honorable the House of Representatives:

I am in receipt of the following resolution of the House of February 21, 1876:

"On motion of Mr. Lord,

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to inform this House by what authority and for what purpose he recently gave instructions to his subordinates, alleged to be in contravention of the long-established rule relating to the testimony of accomplices in criminal actions."

To which, in reply, I have the honor to suggest that the resolution must have been introduced under misapprehension. No instructions have been given by the Attorney-General to his subordinates in contravention of any rule relating to the testimony of accomplices in criminal actions, and no instructions that had any such purpose or intent, nor any instructions to which any such purpose could be fairly attributed.

The only specific instructions which have been given on this subject are those in attributed.

The only specific instructions which have been given on this subject are those in certain districts where whisky frauds are being prosecuted, and these are merely in confirmation and approval of arrangements made to use the testimony of accomplices. As these arrangements and instructions relate to matters now in progress, the House wilk readily see the propriety of withholding special information relating thereto until the trials are over.

I have the honor to add that in no instance since I have been Attorney-General has there been a proposition of any subordinate of mine relating to the testimony of accomplices in criminal actions which has not met my prompt and cordial sanction.

I have the honor to remain your very obedient,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT,

Attorney-General.

Mr. LORD. As I introduced the resolution to which this letter is a reply, I move that the subject-matter be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Allow me to say in furtherance of that motion that I understand the Attorney-General to substantially admit all that I understand the Attorney-General to substantially admit all that is claimed. He has undertaken to interfere with the rule by which the testimony of accomplices is taken on the ground that abuse might possibly grow out of it, when in fact the person who offers the testimony, as an accomplice, in no case can have any benefit from it unless he tells the truth. Therefore in this action of the Attorney-General, without saying what his motive might be, without attempting to impugn his motives, inasmuch as he has undertaken to change the rule and prejudge the case, and to assume in advance that the accomplices who seek to testify will not tell the truth, I therefore ask that the whole matter may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report to the House what their opinion is as to on the Judiciary, to report to the House what their opinion is as to the whole subject-matter.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that the Attorney-General by taking this course assumes that he is wiser than the jury which tries the case.

Mr. HENDEE. I rise to a point of order. Is this matter subject to debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rule that debate is

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rule that debate is in order, the morning hour not having commenced.

Mr. RANDALL. Why is a question of reference not debatable?

Mr. RUSK. Has not the morning hour been called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has not been called.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is here. I say, after this interruption, the Attorney-General assumes that in advance he can tell better whether an accomplice is telling the truth than the jury which hears the case and the judge who tries it; therefore, in view of such a vital and important change of the law which has been the law for centuries, I think we ought to have the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the Judiciary Committee inquire into the circumstances connected with this matter and what induced the writing of the letter which has been referred to. I think that should come within the full scope of the inquiry of the Judiciary Committee. It was an extraordinary letter, perhaps adapted to an extraordinary occasion; but the committee ought also to tell us the circumstances connected with its issue, and I therefore suggest that the Judiciary Committee should make inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury as well as the Attorney-General into all this matter and settle this controversy.

The letter of the Attorney-General was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST-ROUTES IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the establishment of a weekly mail-route, in the county of Manitowoc, and a joint memorial of the Legislature of the same State, relative to increased mail service in the county of Pepin; which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. SWANN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved. That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized and instructed to inquire further into the connection of the United States minister at the court of St. James with the Emma mine, so called; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and leave is given to said committee to sit during the session of this House.

Mr. SWANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, and Mr. PAGE called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will now begin at seven minutes before one o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference. printing and reference.

Mr. GOODIN. Under this call will all the States and Territories be called for bills and joint resolutions?

Concurrent resolution relative to the granting of subsidies by Congress in aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad and other internal improvements.

the Texas Pacific Railroad and other internal improvements.

Whereas it appears that applications for the aid of the National Government, in the form of money, credit, bonds, or indorsements of the bonds of private corporations, are now pending in the Congress of the United States to an amount exceeding $600,000,000, for the purpose of promoting schemes of canals, railroads, or other internal improvements, the value and utility of which are at least doubtful, and which are not demanded for present commercial, military, or national reasons; and whereas it also appears that important committees of the said Congress are now seriously considering the propriety of recommending the appropriate legislation whereby the United States will be committed to a guarantee or indorsement of the interest payments upon the bonds or promissory obligations of certain railroad corporations, amounting in the aggregate to about $250,000,000 in gold, for the purpose of constructing a railroad line from Northeastern Texas to the Pacific Ocean, near the thirty-second parallel of latitude, with numerous branches thereof, amounting to over three thousand miles; and that this encouragement given to this class of proposals tends constantly to swell the number and extent of such applications and is giving rise to many schemes of like questionable character which have failed to secure the approval of private capitalists, and which, by their combined influence and support, embarrass, retard, and interfere with the proper subjects of legislation:

Be it resolved, (if the assembly concur.) That it is unwise, impolitic, and dangerous at this time of depressed trade and heavy financial burdens for Congress to embark the country upon such gigantic works, and thereby invite other and further demands for national assistance, to the detriment of the people and good government, and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper influences to counteract and defeat such attempts; and that the secretary of state be instructed to forward without delay a copy hereof to each of them.

The foregoing resolution was duly passed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

A prolonged delay in furnishing provisions to these Indians will cause great distress, and be likely to provoke raids on white settlements, and possibly lead to a general outbreak of hostilities.

I therefore deem it proper to invite your attention to the importance of each of the cause of the cause

It now stands upon the Calendar, and to save the trouble of another reference and another report, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate that it may be acted upon now.

well & Co., Stettaur Brothers, and other leading merchants of Chicago, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law, the repeal to take effect at a date not later than July 1, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Nicholas Vedder, late additional paymaster United States Army, praying to be allowed a credit of $1,500 in the settlement of his accounts for an alleged overaddition in payments to troops, and also to have refunded to him out of the Treasury the sum of $6,500 alleged to have been stolen from him by Major H. K. Lawrence, who was assigned to count certain moneys transferred to him by Major H. O. Brigham, chief paymaster at New Orleans in the year 1863; which was referred to the Committee on

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of citizens of Lowville, New York, praying the repeal of the bankrupt act; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT. Yesterday my colleague [Mr. BOOTH] presented a memorial of the Legislature of California, asking for appropriate legislation to give the people of that State lower charges for the transmission of telegraphic messages, the price now paid being twenty-five cents a word, which is an illustration perhaps of the difficulty throughout the whole country. Several bills are pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads relating to that matter. The resolution of the Legislature of California was referred to the Committee on Commerce, which is not, I believe, considering the subject. mittee on Commerce, which is not, I believe, considering the subject. If in order, I ask that a change of reference be made, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that change of reference will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 75) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, permitting national banks to organize with a capital of $50,000 in towns irrespective of population, to report it back, with a written report, adversely. I move, unless the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ingalls] objects, that the bill be in-the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] objects, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr.INGALLS. I have received numerous communications from national banks and banking corporations, both in cities and in rural districts, all urging that some measure of this kind might receive favorable action at this session of Congress, and, if the Senator from Ohio has no objection, I would like to have the bill go upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar and the report will be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 389) for the relief of Edward Corselius and seven other persons, late members of the First Michigan Cavalry Veteran Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 349) for the relief of Evin Hughs, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 377) for the relief of the widow of Harvey Hensley, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Bowlin, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 163) for the relief of J. M. Thompson, late chaplain First South Carolina Volunteers, afterward Thirty-third United States Colored Troops, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of C. W. Brink, praying compensation while employed in carrying dispatches from the United States minister at Mexico to the United States Government at Washington, during the year 1869, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands, reported it without amendment. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain, to report it without amendment. This person rendered very important service to Great Britain, as is detailed in a letter from the British minister.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

E. RUMSEY WING.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am also directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rum-382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Runsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky, to report it with an amendment; and if there is no objection I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to have that explained a little, and know what are the precedents for it before I object.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCreery] can explain it better than I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought not to be done except in case of extreme destitution. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania know any prece-

Does the Senator from Pennsylvania know any precedestitution. dent for it?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Kentucky will be good enough to explain.

Mr. McCREERY. The only explanation that I can make is that Hon. E. Rumsey Wing was appointed minister from this country to the court of Ecuador, in South America, where he died in the discharge of his duty. An appropriation of $1,000 has been made here-tofore for the removal of the remains of a former minister, as I have been informed by the Secretary of State. I introduced this bill upon the settled practice, as I regarded it, of this country. The same amount was appropriated for the removal of the remains of Minister Coggeshall that we ask in this instance. I do not suppose there is any serious question about this matter or any doubt of the power of this Government any more than there would be to transfer the remains of a member of this body dying here to his home for interment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As far as I recollect, the precedent to which the Senator from Kentucky refers was a case where it appeared, and was so reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the minister died in extreme destitution, and that his family and friends were from poverty absolutely unable to provide for his body being brought back to the United States, and on that ground the law was passed. Although that is pretty doubtful ground, still we did it. If this case is of that character, then the instance referred to would be a precent is of that character, then the instance referred to would be a precedent. I would like to ask the Senator from Kentucky what was the dent. I would like to ask the Senator from Kentucky what was the condition of this gentleman, when he died, as to pecuniary resources? Mr. McCREERY. I dislike to go into any gentleman's private affairs on an application of this sort; but Mr. Wing was a young man. He was a man of capacity, a man of character, but as far as this world's goods are concerned I think, although he could not have been styled destitute, he was probably in what might be termed reduced circumstances. I do not know that his family could undergo the charge of the removal of his remains. I do not know that they are able to do so. I suppose probably the remarks which were made in reference to the case to which the gentleman alludes may be equally applicable to Mr. Wing. I believe what I have stated with regard to Mr. Wing, that he had little beyond his capacity and integrity. I hope that the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his objection and allow the Senate to proceed with the consideration of this bill. I knew Mr. Wing very well, knew him from his birth, and I have rarely known a more accomplished gentleman, or a young man of higher promise or brighter

Mr. BOGY. I would inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if it is intended that this bill should pass by the vote of the other side of the House exclusively? because this side has not heard a word which he has said. If he expects to get our votes, we should be very glad to hear his statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator from Kentucky has deserted his side and gone over to that side, if it is an exclusive thing of that kind, we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. McCREERY. I did not know that there was any objection on that side. I was addressing my remarks principally to the objector. I did not know that the Senator from Missouri had any objection whatever to the appropriation for the removal of the remains of Mr.

Wing.

Mr. BOGY. We may have no objection, but we are anxious to hear

Mr. McCREERY. The Senator from Vermont, as the Senator from Missouri, may not have heard his last remark, proposes that the bill shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the bill shad better go over, and we will look at the precedents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

LIEUTENANT HENRY METCALFE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am also directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) authorizing First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, to accept a decoration from the Sultan of Turkey, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, preceded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to accept a decoration of the Order of the Osmanie, which has been tendered him by the Sultan of Turkey as an evidence of his appreciation of the efforts of that officer in conducting the inspection of arms and ammunition now making for the imperial Ottoman government in the cities of Providence, Rhode Island, and Bridgeport and New Haven, Connecticut.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print one thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims for the use of the Senate, to report back the same without amendment and re-commend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to,

as follows:

Resolved. That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims on Senate bill No. 137 be printed for the use of the Senate.

REDEMPTION OF TAX LANDS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for the redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment. If there be no objection, as the bill, if it is to have effect, had better be passed at once, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill which extends to February 1, 1877, the time within which lands held by the United States under the several time within which lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be redeemed, and provides that the expenses already incurred in preparing for the sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORTON. I rise for a moment to a personal explanation. find in the Baltimore Sun of this morning what purports to be the evidence of James E. Lyon, of Racine, Wisconsin, before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House yesterday, relating to the Emma silver mine speculation. This I believe is the report of the Associated

Mr. Lyon said that originally he owned a one-third interest in the Monitor lode, which afterward became the Emma mine, and detailed at length how Henry H. Baxter and T. W. Parke came to purchase an interest in the Monitor lode for $375,000. Suits arose, and the witness, to secure his right, employed ex-Senator Wm. M. Stewart, of Nevada, and General Hilyer, under a written contract, as his counsel. He and Stewart visited Salt Lake City, where they met Senator Morron, to whom Stewart related the difficulty of obtaining a trial in the courts of that Territory. Mr. Morron said it was all wrong, when Mr. Stewart-replied that if Mr. Morron would assist he should have $20,000. An effort was made to have Judge McKean removed, but without success. They objected to McKean because he was engaged in trying in his own court a case in which he was interested, being the president of and a large shareholder in a company engaged in litigation with another similar mining company.

This statement would leave the inverses of the state o

This statement would leave the impression, perhaps, that I had accepted a fee of $20,000 in that case, and that I had participated in the attempt to have Judge McKean removed. In it there is not one syllable of truth. The whole matter is this: I was on my way home from Congress at the adjournment in 1871, I believe it was. Mr. Stewart, then a member of this body, came to me on the train between here and Pittsburgh and stated the circumstances of a lawsuit then pending in the Territory of Utah. He made some statement in regard to the conduct of the court, and wished to have me retained as assistant counsel in the case, stating that if he should be successful I would receive a large fee. I do not think any sum was mentioned. He introduced to me a gentleman on the train, one of the parties in interest, who I am now informed is Mr. Lyon, this witness. I supposed at first that it was legitimate, professional employment, and told Mr. Stewart that I would take it under advisement, and, if I thought well of it, I would accede to his wish to meet him at Salt Lake City and examine into the case. He proposed that I should come there and consult with him in regard to it at a certain time. In that way we parted. Afterward I became satisfied that it was not a case in which I, as a member of the Senate of the United States, could engage. I received a dispatch from Mr. Stewart to meet me in Salt Lake City. I declined to go. I never did meet him there. I never had anything to do with the Emma Mine case. I never had any conversation with him afterward in regard to the subject, and the whole matter dropped right there. I became satisfied that the object of the parties—I will not say that it was Mr. Stewart's purpose—was to secure not my professional services, but my political influence in the removal of the judge. I declined to have anything to do with it. I never saw Mr. Stewart or Mr. Lyon in Salt Lake City. I went before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House this morning, and met Mr. Lyon there. I made my statement, which Mr. Lyon agreed was strictly correct. He said he did not testify that I had met him or Mr. Stewart in Salt Lake City or that I had ever taken a fee. This is the whole matter. My whole connection with the matter was that a fee was offered to me in the case, which, upon reflection, I afterward declined to accept, and I had nothing whatever to do with it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire by request to introduce a bill, and I ask that the bill and accompanying memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the memorial being printed.
Mr. COCKRELL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 523) granting a charter to the New York and Mazatlan Air-Line Railroad, Telegraph and Immigration Company; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I not only make objection to printing the memorial, but I object to printing long bills that are so often introduced by us, by myself as well as other Senators, by request. It costs much to print a long bill, and sometimes these bills presented by request are never taken up. The title of the bill just presented is very airy, I notice. Still I have no great objection to printing the bill, but, as to printing memorials, it ought never to be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not insist on printing the memorial, and I desire to say in connection with the introduction of this bill that I know nothing of it at all. I introduce it by request, and I am not to be considered as being for or against it.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 524) to amend section 1002 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 525) to amend section 994 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 526) to amend section 1036 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 527) for the relief of Major Nicholas Vedder, introduce a bill (8. No. 527) for the rener of analor Micholas vedder, paymaster United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 528) to incorporate the Capital Gas Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I introduce this bill by request. I do not ask that it be printed. It is House bill No. 2166. I ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I wish to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds do not desire to monopolize any business; but they have a bill now before them in relation to another gas company, which was first referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I therefore submit to the Senator from Michigan that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have no objection to that reference,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been requested to introduce a bill, and I do so without committing myself to its provisions, for I have not had the time to examine it.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 529) for the liquidation of the debt of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company to the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 530) to re-imburse purchases at direct-tax sales in Arkansas, declared illegal by United States courts in consequence of a defective board of commissioners; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DORSEY. I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims. Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. WRIGHT. I think that matter legitimately belongs to the Committee on Finance. It has been there before, at the last session, and I think the bill should be referred to that committee.

Mr. DORSEY. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 531) for the relief of Captain James M. Beebe; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 532) to authorize the restoratained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 552) to authorize the restoration of Nathan D. A. Sawyer to the rank of captain and quartermaster in the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 533) to explain and perfect previous legislation relating to expenses of the United States commissioner to the international prison congress; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 534) to establish a mail-route; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and

and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 536) granting the right of way through the public lands for wagon-roads over the Blue Mountains, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WORKS OF ART AT THE CENTENNIAL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of allowing artists having examples of their works in the National Statuary Hall the privilege of exhibiting the same at the Centennial Anniversary of American Independence in Philadelphia, with conditions for their safe return.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out, commencing on line 35, page 2, the following

For sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496: Provided, That sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for itsell years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are, repealed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of Military Academy band, $14,880.

The amendment was agreed to

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 3, lines 51 and 52, to increase the appropriation "for repairs and improvements and for pay of citizen mechanics and laborers employed upon repairs that cannot be done by enlisted men" from $12,000 to $14,500.

Mr. EATON. I hope, before we agree to the committee's amendment increasing the expenditures, that the chairman of the committee will inform us of the necessity of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that the estimates provide for $22,500 to carry on the ordinary repairs of the different buildings at West Point. The Committee on Appropriations of the House fixed the sum at $12,000. Upon consultation and examination at the proper places, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate thought that $14,500 was actually necessary to keep these buildings in proper repair, and therefore they have added $2,500 to the appropriation as the bill came to us from the House. I can assure the Seuator from Connecticut that this sum is necessary to keep in proper preservation the numerous buildings at West Point.

Mr. EATON. I notice the bill coming from the other House calls for $12,000 for repairs that cannot be done by enlisted men. Do I understand the chairman of the committee or its organ, the Senator who reports this bill, to say that such an examination has been made so that he is able to say that the necessary repairs cannot be done by enlisted men unless we appropriate $14,500 instead of $12,000? Has
